Fashion fans, take note: You don't have to be a student to peek inside the storied closet at Newton's Lasell College, thanks to the Lasell Catalogue of Artistry in Fashion, a new online resource documenting design techniques with museum-quality photos, 3-D imagery, interviews and video demos. Created with help from a National Endowment for the Arts grant in collaboration with Lowell's American Textile History Museum, it's organized by category, from embroidering to millinery, and features many looks from Lasell's 2,000-item fashion collection (like the '60s number seen here). The catalogue debuts with an Oct. 1 fete at the French Cultural Center as part of Boston Fashion Week, which features dozens of other happenings—including an "open runway" and a flash mob street show—from Sept. 27 to Oct. 3. / Jacqueline Houton

FAME AND MISFORTUNE

A LOCAL PSYCHOLOGIST TURNS THE SPOTLIGHT ON OUR OBSESSION WITH CELEBRITY.

Celebrity & Entertainment Obsession: Understanding Our Addiction* by Michael S. Levy
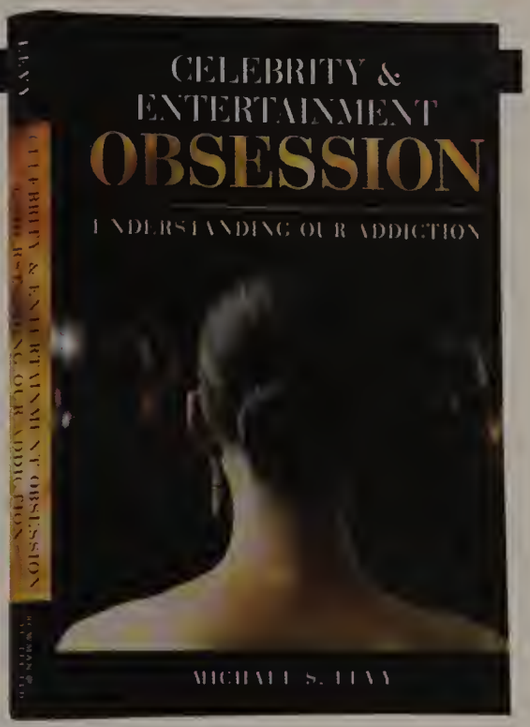
Published by Rowman & Littlefield, 250 pages, $40



"HEROIN" IS JUST ONE LETTER AWAY from "heroine," and local psychologist Michael Levy, who works with drug users, sees some disturbing parallels between addiction to substances and our deep ties to the stars that sparkle in the world of entertainment. Though celebrities don't know us, we "know" them through the media we consume. This connection, somewhat like that of an infant and a mother, brings comfort, linking us as we idolize their talents and colorful lives.

But, Levy says, there's a problem: Loneliness glues us to these entrancing but worrisomely imaginary friends, and these relationships—he labels them "parasocial"—often keep us from our real friends and lives. Kim Kardashian, after all, is not your girlfriend.

What's more, as our obsession with celebrity has increased, so have opportunities for becoming a star through homemade YouTube videos or reality TV, where the reckless narcissism on display is wilder than actual celebrities' exploits. Needless to say, Levy thinks there are more meaningful paths to self-worth.

In exploring the psychology of our dependence on our idols, Levy notes that as much as we covet their money and fame, it's celebrities' tabloid-shouted miseries that bring them closer to us. Aging, they "die" on magazine covers. Till then, they shine, thrillingly, dangerously bright.

FROM PAGE 163: Some research supports the idea that for people with low self-esteem, even writing about their favorite celebrity can actually increase their own sense of worth, at least temporarily. It is like they feel they have a close relationship with this person, and thinking about this individual augments their own pride and self-confidence. ◆

PRECIOUS CHINA

EAT AND SHOP YOUR WAY THROUGH HONG KONG AND SHANGHAI

A "SLOW BOAT TO CHINA" MIGHT SOUND romantic, but that's what the annoying reality of getting there from Boston used to feel like. With at least one connection necessary, several hours were added to the already painful 16-hour flight. Enter Cathay Pacific, which now offers direct service from Logan to Hong Kong, and with a premium economy option, you can feel a bit less like steerage as you wing your way to the Far East.

Among Hong Kong's numerous five-star hotels is the Cordis in Mongkok, which not only has a rooftop pool, the Chuan spa, with sweeping views over Victoria Harbor, and the Michelin-rated Ming Court restaurant, but one of the best hotel amenities we've encountered: Each room is equipped with a smartphone that can dial anywhere in the world, serves as a Wi-Fi hot spot, features the latest camera technology and comes loaded with maps and itineraries that put the city at your fingertips.

Two of the best reasons to visit Hong Kong are to shop and to eat. The former is fairly self-explanatory: The Electronics Market sells electronics, the Wet Market sells fish, the Ladies Market sells household goods. At all of them, haggling is expected, and you can find inexpensive knockoffs of the designer brands that have boutiques in upscale shopping areas like the Harbour City mall and Tsim Sha Tsui on Kowloon peninsula. "Caveat emptor" is the phrase to keep in mind at the profusion of antique shops along Hollywood Road; if there were that many Tang Dynasty vases, they wouldn't be so valuable.

As for eating, the ceaselessly changing culinary landscape demands a local guide. Little Adventures in Hong Kong was founded by a New York Times columnist who has lived in the city for decades, and the guides on her walking tours include a popular local food critic and a Hong Kong-bred, Cordon Bleu-trained chef. Offering a native's expertise, they will explain how to tell good dried fish bladder from the inferior stuff, show you out-of-the-way shops where you can buy local delicacies like Mrs. So's X.O. Sauce and take you to the restaurant where wonton soup was supposedly invented.

You can't throw a dart without hitting a restaurant in Hong Kong. (Between the heat and the size of apartment kitchens, locals eat out even more than New Yorkers.) Two that deserve note are Pawn, a wildly popular Western eatery in a former pawn shop, and Mrs. Pound, a speakeasy restaurant with a quirky made-up backstory and superbly inventive food. Of course, no Hong Kong trip is complete without a junk ride on Victoria Harbor and a visit to the world's largest seated Buddha on Lantau Island, but those looking to escape the city's frenetic pace would do well to hire a taxi to Repulse Bay for a beach day.

If Hong Kong has a sister city on the mainland, it has to be Shanghai, a two-hour flight away. Centered on the waterfront of the Huangpu River, the city of 24 million people offers a mix of ancient and space-age sights. On one side are futuristic edifices like the new Shanghai Tower (China's tallest building) and the World Financial Center (the former title-holder, often referred to as "the bottle opener"). On the other is the Bund, a promenade that harks back to Shanghai's 1930s and '40s heyday. A walk there reveals gems like the Fairmont Peace Hotel, an art deco treasure that contains the city's top jazz club. Here, a full orchestra of musicians in white dinner jackets, some in their 80s, perform a mix of American and Shanghainese jazz fronted by a beautiful chanteuse wearing a cheongsam. It's sobering to realize that for much of the musicians' lives—during the Cultural Revolution—jazz was considered "yellow music" (essentially pornography).

A unique and adrenaline-pumping way to see the city is offered by Shanghai Insiders, which hosts motorcycle sidecar tours that visit some overlooked sights and travel through the old European concessions. If a peaceful stroll is more your speed, get a taste of old Shanghai at Yuyuan Garden, a Ming Dynasty (circa 1600) complex of ponds and pavilions that's one of China's greatest cultural treasures. Xintiandi, meanwhile, is a district of preserved 19th-century shikumen ("stone gate" houses), now home to upscale designer boutiques. For a more Chinese retail experience, visit the South Bund Fabric Market, where a man can have a traditional silk Mandarin jacket made for as little as $65 (haggling required).

China's two great mercantile cities confound expectations. In putatively communist Shanghai, Bentleys and Birkins are relatively common sights while in "westernized" Hong Kong, a subway ride will take you to a fishing village on stilts that hasn't changed much in centuries. It's this mix of tradition and modern exuberance that makes Hong Kong and Shanghai so fascinating. Bring your ability to be wowed, and leave your preconceptions behind. ◆

LO-FI COUNTRY

THE FROGMORE BRINGS LOWCOUNTRY CUISINE WITH WINNING SINCERITY.

THE FROGMORE
365 Centre St , Boston

SOUTHERN CUISINE IS HAVING A MOMENT on the Boston restaurant scene. Beyond the neighborhood soul-food spots that have long peppered Dorchester and Roxbury, our barbecue joints essay the distinctive slow-smoked styles of Texas, Tennessee and Carolina. Dozens of tonier restaurants now feature Southern gumbos, shrimp and grits, and deep-fried dishes of chicken, pickles and catfish. But the level of apparent sincerity varies. For every Tupelo doing heartfelt Creole and Cajun, there's an eyebrow-waggling, high-concept pastiche of Southern cuisine: "We have country music and bacon/pimento-cheese bites, yee-haw!" So it's gratifying to run across the new Frogmore in Jamaica Plain, where executive chef Jason Albus is showcasing the little-seen, seafood-heavy Lowcountry cuisine of coastal South Carolina—a fascinating old fusion of African, Caribbean, native and Western European influences—with real feeling and only occasional creative flourishes.

For instance, an appetizer of pork n' beans ($12) is dressed up just enough to shed its cheap-calorie origins with tiny, al dente petite rouge beans and a slab of crisp molasses-glazed pork belly in place of humble fatback; it kicks the ass of its mushy, cloying New England cousin. Grilling instead of frying okra ($8) eliminates most of its gooey mucilage; the crisp/crunchy result is nicely counterpointed with peak-of-season yellow tomatoes, presenting a potential conversion moment for the okra-averse. Runner bean salad ($8) coats green beans, onions and fried garlic with a refreshingly light dressing of clotted buttermilk, mild and cooling. Soups and stews consistently dazzle with richness and complexity, as in the Lowcountry classic of she-crab soup ($9), which smoothly blends crab, crab roe, cream and fino sherry into a sophisticated chowder, and in smoked turkey stew ($9), with okra, tomatoes and deeply smoky shredded turkey, topped with the crouton-like crunch of fried pig ear. Chicken n' dumplings ($19) is a similarly hearty and comforting stew of chicken, carrots and peas in white gravy, given heft with dense gnocchi-like dumplings.

Deep smoke flavor elevates an astonishing succotash ($18) of smoked corn, lima beans and faro verde dotted with scallions and wee pattypan squashes, a rich ham broth completing a sublime vegetable entree. The Lowcountry boil ($25) of shrimp, soft-shell crab, smoked sausage, corn and potatoes reads as a spicier Southern echo of New England boiled dinners, while the fish camp plate (market price) attractively and deftly fries a whole fish of the day (redfish on one visit) and flanks it with fat onion rings and excellent slaw. Thin boneless pork chops ($23) don't benefit from Southern aversion to medium-rare cooking, but are rescued from dryness by terrific pickled peaches and roasted pepper sauce. A side dish of cornbread ($5) dressed with hot pepper/honey butter features whimsical corncob shapes but doesn't solve the eternal riddle "Will New Englanders ever sample truly savory Southern cornbread?" By contrast, hush puppies ($4) served fresh from the fryer are utterly fantastic: Eat 'em quick and skip the tartar sauce.

Desserts are big, hearty, sweet and satisfying, as in sorghum cake ($9), a chewy, sticky confection dotted with cocoa nibs and pecan brittle, and a lovely angel food cake ($9) complemented by rum-soaked pineapple, sugared cherries and a drizzle of sweet cream, plus a fascinating, airy cookie-like crisp from the same batter.

The bar program might have been hamstrung by its cordials license, but the Frogmore responds cleverly with a slate of complex, not-overly-sweet original cocktails like the Sun City ($10), which gets an almost Tiki-like kick out of honey-sweetened gin, pineapple, lime, madeira and black pepper, and the Take Me Home Again ($10), with the sweet-spiced Czech bitters Becherovka, Amaro Montenegro, lemon and tea combining to intriguing herbal effect. The dozen craft brews on tap ($6-$8) should satisfy JP's avid beer-nerd contingent, but the inclusion of three rust-belt lawnmower beers (Carling's Black Label, Schaefer, Genesee Cream Ale) for $3 each seems an apt nod to Lowcountry unpretentiousness. The wine list reflects co-owner Steve Bowman's devotion to small, obscure American vintners, with by-the-glass offerings like a 2010 Domaine de la Terre Rouge Tête-à-Tête Red Blend ($12), a big, beefy, Rhône-like blend of grenache, syrah and mourvedre, and nice-priced bottles like the 2014 Edmunds St. John "Bone-Jolly" ($40), a coppery gamay rosé.

A comfortable patio and spacious, dimly lit bar complement a dining room with the faded-grandeur charm of an ancient Southern manor, with mismatched servingware and chandeliers, heavy maroon drapes, old oil portraits and pineapples on the colorful wallpaper. The pineapple as a symbol of hospitality certainly echoes the efforts of the waitstaff to make guests feel loved and well cared for, the Frogmore's clearest connection to the owners' other restaurant, Brookline's Fairsted Kitchen, which has earned raves here for its insistently warm service. In the end, that earnest, unforced desire to please might be what sets the Frogmore apart from its reverse-carpetbagging competition: genuine Southern food and hospitality, served without winking or air quotes. ◆

Q: WHAT'S THE BEST WAY TO GET RID OF BROWN SUNSPOTS ON MY FOREHEAD?

A: Brown sunspots, age spots, and freckles develop on the parts of our body that are prone to sun exposure. Luckily, these unsightly spots can be lightened or eliminated with IPL (Intense Pulsed Light) treatments.

IPL, sometimes referred to as a photo-facial, is a safe, FDA- approved method of utilizing flashes of light energy to break up the melanin that forms brown spots. The melanin breaks apart and is absorbed by your body, eliminating the brown spots. The procedure is quick and there is no downtime. The procedure can also clear up brown spots on the chest and hands.

IPL is also used to eliminate broken capillaries or redness in your complexion. It is effective for tiny vessels that look like little streams, as well as general redness, or ruddiness, as is found with rosacea.

IPL is the fastest and most effective method to even out your skin tone!

SCHOOL'S OUT

"Circle, circle, dot, dot—now you have a cootie shot." So goes the old playground rhyme kids would chant to protect each other from the dreaded touch of "icky" members of the opposite sex. If only it were so easy for moviegoers to vaccinate themselves from films that fail to follow through on entertaining premises, like Cooties, a comic-horror hybrid that presents a unique twist on the zombie genre, only to stumble badly as the movie moves beyond the schoolyard.

This first feature from directors Jonathan Milott and Cary Murnion isn't about a disease passed on by touch, but rather an initially foodborne illness spread by cannibalistic bites and bloody scratches. The culprit? Contaminated chicken nuggets that we see being created during the pre-credit sequence that opens the film: A lone fly lays eggs on one of the freshly plucked carcasses at a poultry farm, and crawling maggots mix with the meat that's ground, processed, packaged and shipped to a nearby elementary school. In a final close-up, a pigtailed young girl bites into a nugget as a viscous sludge spews forth from within. Ah, school lunch.

Cut to Clint Hadson (Elijah Wood, the film's producer) as he awakens in the attic room of his mother's house to a report on his bedside clock radio mentioning a recall on, yes, chicken nuggets. Clint is an aspiring horror author who's just returned home to Fort Chicken, Illinois, after an unsuccessful stint living and working in New York. Driving to his new job as a substitute teacher, he arrives at Fort Chicken Elementary, which he graduated from in 1988. Exiting his Prius, he overhears a mother who's dropping off her son. "You're grounded," she tells him. "You come straight home." The defiant boy's response? "Fuck you, Mom." The school may be the same, but the students sure have changed.

Clint is greeted by Vice Principal Simms (Ian Brennan, one of the movie's co-writers, and a writer/producer known for TV's Glee and the upcoming Scream Queens). With his boss away on vacation, Simms has his own ideas about how to run things, declaring the school a "no cellphone campus"—a policy that extends to the faculty, conveniently negating an obvious way they could call for help if need be.

It's a fun premise for a horror comedy, but unfortunately, a fun premise is all it remains.

Clint is thrilled to find out that said faculty includes Lucy (Alison Pill), a former classmate and crush. We quickly meet the rest of the quirky, stereotypical staff: closeted art teacher Tracy (30 Rock's Jack McBrayer), his nemesis, creationist science teacher Rebekkah (Saturday Night Live's Nasim Pedrad), socially awkward sex-ed teacher Doug (co-writer Leigh Whannell, a writer/producer known for Saw and Insidious) and gym teacher Wade (The Office's Rainn Wilson), a former jock gone to seed—and also Lucy's jealous boyfriend.

Once in his classroom, Clint attempts to connect with a new generation of kids by asking them to call him by his first name, which he writes on the chalkboard. Patriot (Cooper Roth), the boy we'd seen earlier mouthing off to his mother, loudly and intentionally misreads his new teacher's name as a four-letter word. Turning the focus back on Patriot, Clint asks him how he got his name. "I was born on September 11," the obnoxious lad boasts. "God sent me on that day. That's why, on my 18th birthday? I'm joining the Marines—just to kick some towel-head ass!"

Continuing to disrupt class, Patriot teases Shelly (Sunny May Allison), a sickly-looking young girl, for having "cooties." Pulling on one of her pigtails, he unexpectedly rips it clean off, leaving a gory wound on the scalp of the girl we recognize as the one from the film's opening moments. Not yet Marine material, Patriot is stunned when the feral child pounces, biting off a chunk of his cheek.

By recess, Patriot and nearly all the rest of the pre-pubescent children have been transformed into bloodthirsty, brain-dead cannibals. The horrified teachers barricade themselves inside, trying to figure out how to save themselves from the "little cootie kids." It's a fun premise for a horror comedy, but unfortunately, a fun premise is all it remains.

Milott and Murnion have been in such a hurry to set up the pandemic that we're only 20 minutes into the picture, and it has nowhere left to go, aside from hitting overly familiar beats—the first victim of the kiddies' hunger for human flesh is a black man, for example—once Whannell and Brennan's screenplay begins dipping into predictable conventions.

Lost's Jorge Garcia also appears, but after he's introduced as school crossing guard Rick, he spends most of the movie doing absolutely nothing behind the wheel of a parked van, which is a good metaphor for how aimless the film becomes.

There is a decent amount of viscera for the gore hounds in the audience to chew on—along with a few quotable lines for everyone else. But as the early laughs become a distant memory, we all discover that there's no real end in sight; rather than resolution, we're presented with the promise of a sequel. Personally, I'd rather eat the chicken nuggets. ◆

ALABAMA BREAKOUTS PULL OFF STARTLING CHANGE IN SOUND & COLOR

ANYONE JARRED BY ALABAMA SHAKES' jump from the classic soul-rock of the band's 2012 debut Boys & Girls—stirred by Brittany Howard's volcanic vocals—to the mysterious, minimalist art-funk on follow-up Sound & Color should consider the alternatives.

"We're all pretty much into heavy metal," drummer Steve Johnson says. "Brittany likes Lamb of God, and I've always been a Pantera fan." As for bassist Zac Cockrell, Johnson says, "He's into anything where you can't understand the lyrics, and he's also really into pop-country. That boy loves some pop-country."

Add influences from Ennio Morricone's spaghetti-western soundtracks and R&B poet Gil Scott-Heron to Johnson's discovery of experimental German rockers Can as well as the Fleetwood Mac instrumentals that Sound & Color co-producer Blake Mills threw into their listening stew. It's no wonder that the Shakes broke bounds.

"There was a lot of experimenting," Johnson says of Nashville sessions for Sound & Color, which was released in April. "We all wanted it to be better than our first album, and we knew that it was going to be different because our tastes and style had changed.... Everyone was interested in what the possibilities were."

The group, rounded out by guitarist Heath Fogg and touring keyboardists Ben Tanner and Paul Horton, injected new wrinkles from fuzz-bass bombs to strings. "We'd stack cymbals on top of cymbals," Johnson says, "turn them upside down, have cymbals on snare drums." Howard laced songs with vibraphone and pushed her voice in unusual directions, unleashing pinched cries in "Don't Wanna Fight" and playing otherworldly siren in the spacey "Gemini," an opportunity to let loose in the studio's echo chambers. "We took full advantage of those," Johnson says. "There were times where she would go in and, in one take, 'Boom!' "

Alabama Shakes have changed onstage as well. As the group heads for a Sept. 27 Boston Calling finale, sets have proven more moody and sophisticated, distanced from the band's original style, especially with the omission of breakthrough hit "Hold On."

"We got a little burned out on playing it," Johnson says from a California tour stop. "If you're going through the motions and there's no feel there, it doesn't really make sense to do it."

"We all wanted it to be better than our first album, and we knew that it was going to be different..."

The Shakes have been through the motions, from the daily grind of odd jobs to playing tiny bars. Before landing a post office job, Howard worked as a parking lot attendant. "I'd see her just chillin,' smoking cigarettes and not doing anything," says Johnson, a FedEx delivery man at the time. "We'd talk about what songs we wanted to jam on." He went on to a better job at a nuclear plant, but explains, "You'd have to dress up in one of those suits like you see in Back to the Future."

They'd met as teenagers in Athens, Ala., Johnson says. "We played shows together, like small garage-punk shows or whatever. We were just young, dumb kids hanging out at parties."

But Howard blossomed as a singer—and found a musical accomplice in classmate Cockrell. The three launched the Shakes, recruited Fogg and moved from playing James Brown and Led Zeppelin covers in nearby Huntsville to hitting Birmingham and Nashville, bigger cities that accepted original music.

"It was worth it to drive there," Johnson says, though he adds, "We'd probably drink whatever money we made." They finally got a song posted on the influential blog Aquarium Drunkard, prompting the Drive-By Truckers' Patterson Hood to catch a show and inform his managers—among other suddenly interested parties. "It kind of snowballed," Johnson says. "We got a good team."

Critical acclaim and Grammy nominations followed. Given her powerful presence, Howard garnered the most attention and drew predictions that she'll eventually fly solo (in turn, Howard just released an album by side project Thunderbitch, revisiting her garage-punk roots). But that talk doesn't bother Johnson.

"If that's the direction that she goes, I say more power to her, because I know she can do it," he says. "There's always gonna be our thing, but she's going to do her own thing, and that's cool." ◆

SOUTH OF EDEN

THE YUPPIES HAVE TAKEN OVER SOUTHIE, AND THE CHANGE AIN'T ALL GOOD.

A FEW YEARS AGO I WROTE A COLUMN praising the gentrification of Southie, the blossoming of words like "Foodie" and "Provisions" on the storefronts of Broadway. A rising tide floats all parking cones, and I figured that natives and transplants alike would agree that Southie could use a touch of South End upward mobility and maybe 10 percent fewer stabbings. Now, after spending the better part of a week at my place near East Broadway, I have a confession: I was wrong. Enough with the damn yuppies in Southie.

While I don't have a shamrock tattoo or a cousin who can get you anything you want, we did buy our place in 2004, long enough ago that it was an entirely different neighborhood. I'm not a native, but I have a claim to the past, when there was an independent department store on East Broadway that sold mostly Irish paraphernalia—it was always really busy about two days before the St. Paddy's parade and mostly empty the rest of the year. Back then, there were two dozen places to grab a steak bomb and nowhere to get sushi. I'm pretty sure a row house on my street was a full-fledged meth den.

Now? The crack house is a luxury condo building with two sprawling garage doors facing the street—thus claiming three precious street spaces. Damn yuppies. The hardware store was replaced by a store that sells "wares," which are artisan/curated/useless. Damn yuppies. I was in Stop & Shop when I overheard a guy in the beverage aisle ask his Lululemon-clad wife, "Is Poland Spring good enough?" Is Poland Spring good enough? No, you'd better get the Voss. It's right over next to the DAMN YUPPIES.

Don't get me wrong: There are upsides to the demographic swing. There's sushi now, and I like sushi. They brought sand to the beach—literally—and now the Dorchester Bay waterfront is a summertime destination. Also, property values in Southie have increased roughly 95,000 percent since the era when the neighborhood's main industries were racism and parades. But I feel like the urban-Deadwood frontier vibe is on the way out. And the change happened in a hurry.

I mean, the plot of Good Will Hunting hinges on the idea that Matt Damon should want to get out of Southie. Remember Ben Affleck's speech to him? Chuckie says, "You know what the best part of my day is? For about 10 seconds, from when I pull up to the curb and when I get to your door, 'cause I think, maybe I'll get up there and I'll knock on the door and you won't be there." Recent Southie arrivals might wonder why he wouldn't be there. Oooooohhh! Did he rent his place on Airbnb?

When I moved to town, Southie was a place where you could make margaritas on the sidewalk with a gas-powered blender on a Sunday morning (as long as it was the Sunday nearest March 17). It was a place where we invented a game called "P-I-G darts," which was like P-I-G basketball but with darts. (That led to riding a bike inside a bar while throwing darts, a situation that nobody there had any problem with.) And the crowds were always lively. I know a fellow who went home from a bar with an older lady we dubbed "Red," and he reported that when he got back to her place, her laptop was open with porn on the screen. Go Red!

I'm not saying that you can't have similar adventures today, but there's a certain link between gentrification and social mores. When there's a bevy of meth labs and nightly sidewalk fistfights, the pleasures of low-level hooliganism slide under the rada But as property values go up, tolerance for shenanigans goes down. Could I still ride a bike inside a bar while hucking darts? I kind of doubt it. And I suspect the clock is ticking on rampant double-parkin Which is a shame because double-parking is really convenient—for me, when I'm doing it.

During the past few years, I've driven through Southie and noted all the gleaming new condos and swank businesses. The change looks inexorable. But when you actually hang out there for a wee and walk the streets, the granular view is quite a bit different. On Emerson, I strolled past a guy on the sidewalk passed out in one of those walking wheelchair-stool things. Next to him, in a parked car, a woman smoked a cigarette while listening to Lynyrd Skynyrd ("Free Bird," obviously). I was coming from the West Broadway Bank of America, where an armed security guy wearing a bulletproof vest guards the ATM, suggesting that "bank robber might still be a viable occupation in Southie. Edgy! Actually kind of scary!

Hang in there, old-school Southie. Maybe I can buy homemade granola, but I still like dem apples. ◆

Think that's funny? Send unbiased emails to ezra@improper.com.

I have a confession: I was wrong. Enough with the damn yuppies in Southie.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES: The property values aren't the only thing that's changed on Broadway in the last decade.

SOUND ADVICE ON BATTLING BANDMATES, FAMILY DRAMA AND STANDING OUT ON THE JOB

JOHN D. SPOONER IS AN INVESTMENT ADVISER, author and novelist. His most recent book is No One Ever Told Us That: Money and Life Lessons for Young Adults. Here, he responds to queries from advice seekers of all ages. Send your conundrums to thedance@improper.com.

I play bass in a band in my free time. For me, the band is mostly a hobby and a chance to play my instrument in a group, which is fun. However, I have pushed my other friends outside of the band aside because of my involvement with the band. Recently, the band has become more serious, and I have been arguing with other members in the group. What should I do? I don't want to end up friendless, but I can't be a part of this group anymore. A band is like a fragile instrument with parts that need constant fine-tuning. If this cast of characters has become too contentious, trust your instincts and walk away. If you can play bass in this band, you can probably play bass in a hundred other bands and make lots of new friends with your great hobby.

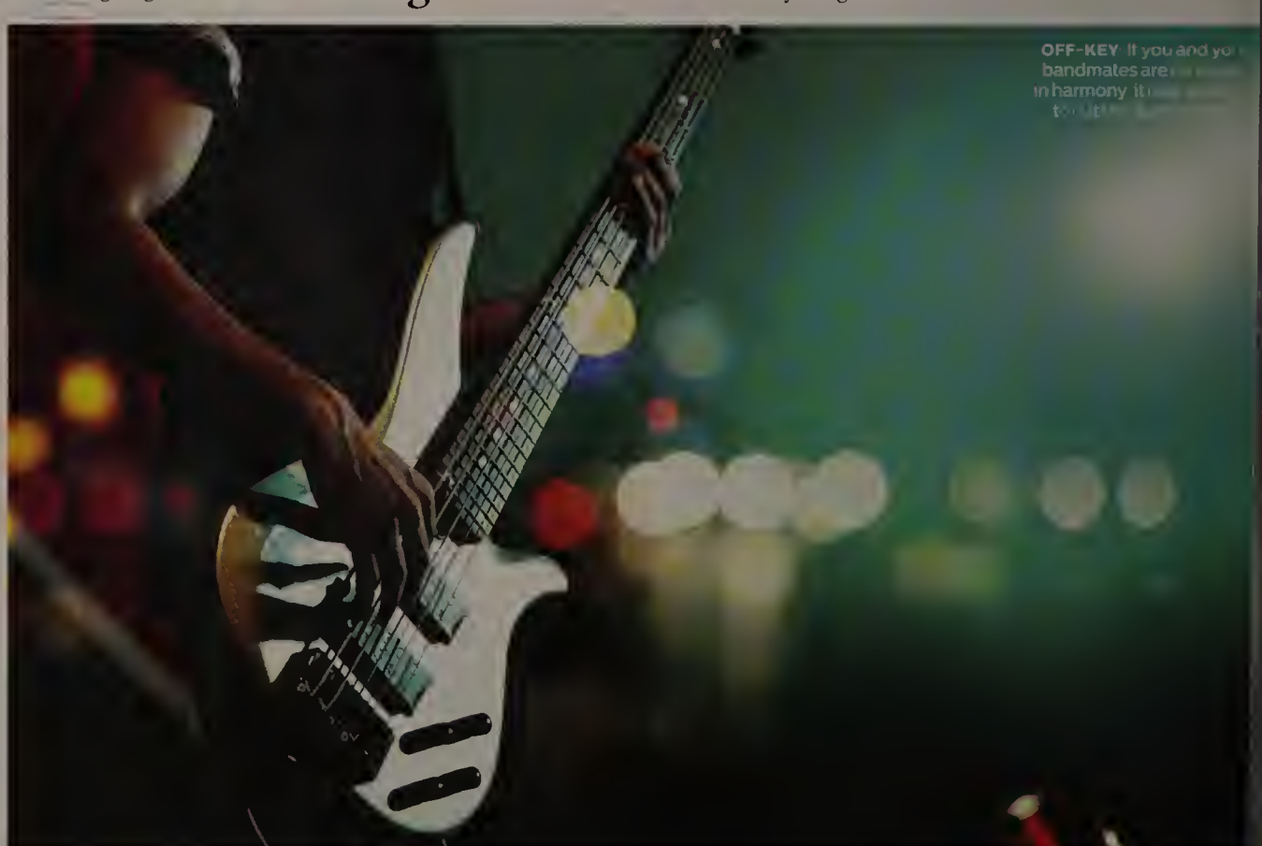
Every creative pursuit has its challenges, whether you play in a band or act or dance or paint or write. Luckily, you don't make a living from your music. One of my sons was the lead singer in a heavy metal band. They played in New York, in the Meatpacking District, and they toyed briefly with the idea of going on the road together. Well, we should always have dreams and adventures—but probably not take heavy metal on the road.

Never be stuck in one niche. Time to move on.

I am a young professional living at home with my parents. My sister and her fiance have been living at home this summer as well. I feel that whenever I want to spend time with my dad, her fiance includes himself. It doesn't help that he is incredibly competitive and only seems to want to impress my parents. How can I spend more time with my dad while not offending my sister? Yikes. Doesn't the fiance work? I think it may be way too late to avoid offending your sister. She has to know how you feel about her fiance, and she will probably take his side, particularly before marriage. I bet there's been a whole lot of whispering behind every door in your house this summer.

When you were in college, you experienced real freedom for the first time, and it's very difficult to return home and be a child again. In college I got my first car, a Volkswagen bug. My father saw me washing it in the driveway one day when I was home for spring break. I saw him watching and couldn't help but say, "Out of your clutches, my Lord." He went ballistic, not coping well with my independence.

So, you indeed can't go home again; you're not the small person you were when you fled the nest. If I were you, as a young professional, I would corral a few friends and rent an apartment together. How do you put a price on aggravation?



It's time for you to find out what it takes to survive outside of the family web. Then you can invite your dad over to your place.

I just started a new job, and I'm really excited about the company. My boss is someone I really admire—an innovator and creative-genius type. The problem is that I think I blend in with all of my coworkers. I don't even know if my boss knows my name. How do I stand out without being a nuisance? We live in an increasingly anonymous society, so I believe that wherever you work, large company or small, you have to try to brand yourself to stand out in a crowd. For instance, it may sound contrived, but I wear red glasses. I like red glasses. And I never really thought about them making a statement, but it turns out that people seem to like and remember them. "Oh, isn't that the guy with the red glasses?!" And I used to know a man who traveled New England selling machine parts. At every office he visited, he would give the receptionist Tootsie Rolls, and he became known as the "Tootsie Roll Man." A small gimmick may have some merit when branding yourself.

You might also just try the "being pleasant" route. Introduce yourself to a few of your coworkers, asking them, "Could I take you to lunch someday and pick your brain about learning to understand the company that's so new to me?" If you're not pushy about it, most people would be happy to help, and it would be a cheap expenditure on your part to create some goodwill for you.

But the best way of all to stand out in the office is to work harder and smarter than everyone else. Go the extra mile. This will get you noticed more than anything else. ◆

Soroff On / Jonathan Tucker

THE LONG GAME

THE ACTOR SHARES THOUGHTS ON ART, SURVIVING IN HOLLYWOOD AND HIS BOSTON WORK ETHIC.

CHILD ACTOR TURNED LEADING MAN JONATHAN Tucker, 33, was born and raised in Charlestown. The son of art historian Paul Hayes Tucker (an expert on Monet) and his equally prominent wife, marketing consultant Maggie Moss-Tucker, Jonathan attended the Park School in Brookline and played Fritz in Boston Ballet's The Nutcracker for five years. He began acting at the age of 12 and has appeared in numerous films, including The Deep End, Hostage, In the Valley of Elah, Love Comes to the Executioner, The Next Three Days, The Ruins, Sleepers, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Two If by Sea and The Virgin Suicides. His television credits include roles on The Black Donnellys, Justified and Parenthood. Currently, he can be seen on the DirecTV drama Kingdom, whose second season premieres on Oct. 14. He lives with his wife in Los Angeles.

JONATHAN SOROFF: Biggest difference in being cast as a child actor and as an adult?
JONATHAN TUCKER: I think I have a lot less fear. When you're younger, you're looking to please, and once you've settled into yourself, you're more willing to take risks.

How did you make that transition without falling into the Hollywood self-destruction hole that seems to swallow so many child stars? I'd say good parents, good education and a healthy sense of humility.

Any advice for the train wrecks? Yeah. In success our friends know us, and in adversity we know our friends. If you think you're looking at the top of the mountain, you are guaranteed to reach a valley, so you'd better be ready.

Your parents are famous art enthusiasts. What's your favorite piece you grew up with? Well, both my parents collect, but my father, in particular, has an affinity for French drawings. That was always a big hit whenever I'd bring a young woman home in high school—have the professor give a tour. And now that I've moved into a home here in Los Angeles, I have a few of those pieces, and they bring me back to my days at 21 Monument Square in Charlestown.

Favorite movie you were in? I recently saw Sleepers again. I showed it to a friend who hadn't seen it, and I've gotta say it's really good. It's strange and exciting to look back on the films that I did when I was younger, because it's not just the movies themselves. They were part of my childhood. It's a double experience.

Would you let your kid act? Only if they dragged me by the hand, the way I did with my parents. They'd need to want it so much [that] they'd have to figure out what an agent is and how to get one.

Best place you've been on location? I fell in love with Nova Scotia. The maritime region of Canada feels like what Cape Cod and Maine and Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard were like before they were discovered by tourists. I ended up going back every summer for six or seven years, and I still kinda pine after it. It's the perfect place to have a summer home. But I've shot all over the world, and I feel very fortunate to be able to do what I love and explore some places that I might not otherwise see.

Worst location? I had a rough time in Romania. The craft services weren't quite what one would expect. [Laughs.] Seriously, it's like the saying that only boring people get bored. Deer Lodge, Montana [the location for Love Comes to the Executioner], has literally two industries: There's a prison, and there's the mine. A lot of people might assume that would be awful, but you kind of look for what it has to offer, and there's always something interesting.

So, earlier you mentioned knowing yourself. What did you mean? Well, I've always known I wasn't the guy who walked down the hallway in high school and all the girls swooned. I was the guy who has the locker next to you, who you end up falling in love with, but I was there the whole time. I've always tried to hold that mirror up, and that's what's nice about being in my 30s. I'm not scared. I know who I am. I'm not looking to please at all costs. I'm looking to collaborate and bring something to the table.

There are a lot of bloggers swooning over your ass right now because of the sex scenes in Kingdom. Well, I can squat 350 pounds. [Laughs.] Seriously, I don't know what to say except that I've worked very hard at expanding what my range is, and you can do that in a practical, concerted way.

"I was the guy who has the locker next to you, who you end up falling in love with, but I was there the whole time."

How? By waking up every day and working, whether or not you have a gig. It's another part of the Bostonian in me, but I try to put in a full day's work at what I do, whether it's movement, studying dialects, the Alexander method, breathing, reading, going to the gym, whatever...All of it is preparation, and I try to focus on it. I don't want to scrape by.

In what role would you say you were cast most against type? Well, I'd say with Kingdom. Most people didn't think—especially while I was playing the mayor of Berkeley on Parenthood—that I'd end up with a Mohawk and a goatee and go up and down 30 pounds in a season as a drug-addicted, alcoholic fighter.

Anyone you'd never work with again, and why? Oh, for sure. There are people who are unprofessional and ego-driven. They don't inspire creative collaboration. They create a fear-based environment in which people feel uncomfortable.

Favorite TV show? Right now? Difficult People. I think it's absolutely genius.

Actor you most want to work with? I'd love to work with Bryan Cranston.

Weirdest thing about LA? How it sucks you in so elegantly that you forget how all the things that used to seem weird are now completely normal. All of a sudden, I'm walking around with cold-pressed juices and a yoga mat, and I'm like, "Wait a second..." Plus, I'm loving it.

Thing you miss most about Boston? How long is this article? I miss absolutely everything. ◆

The days may be getting shorter, but fortunately they're chock-full of intriguing arts happenings. Here's your guide to seizing the season.

BY THE IMPROPER STAFF

HOLGER BADEKOW HAMBURG BALLET

BALLET BY THE NUMBERS

It's been 40 years since John Neumeier originally choreographed Third Symphony of Gustav Mahler for the Hamburg Ballet, and during that time only two other dance companies have performed the piece worldwide. The monumental task involved in staging it has kept the work so lightly performed, but Boston Ballet is up to the challenge and putting on the North American premiere Oct. 22-Nov. 1 at the Boston Opera House. To get a sense of the extensive effort involved, we took a look at the numbers behind Neumeier's tour de force. / Matt Martinelli

MUSICAL MADNESS

The fall season is bringing a bumper crop of musicals. Here's a guide to help you sort through some of the songs and stories hitting Boston stages. / Matt Martinelli

STORY	A famous actress reconnects with a former lover, turning the lives of those around them upside-down.	As an experiment, a down-on-her-luck woman is taken in by an arrogant British professor.	A present-day single mom is surprised when explorer Ernest Shackleton reaches across time during this love story.	The singer/songwriter encounters personal troubles during her rise to stardom.	A young girl attempts to rescue her friend from the Snow Queen's spell in this take on the Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale.	In a riff on a Wor ond Peoce subplot, a lady falls for a married mar while she's waiting for her military fiance
KEY MUSICAL GENRE	Waltz	Show tunes	Folk	Pop/folk/soft rock	Rock/pop	Electropop
SHOW-STOPPING SONG	"Send in the Clowns"	"I Could Have Danced All Night"	"Every Hand to the Lifeboats"	"Will You Love Me Tomorrow"	"Flying"	"Sonya Alone"
REASON TO ATTEND	There's lots of star power, as this Stephen Sondheim favorite stars Tony-nominated Haydn Gwynne in the challenging Desiree Armfeldt role opposite Tony-nominated Stephen Bogardus as Fredrik.	It's a classic, and it's always a treat to see an Eliza Doolittle portrayal. Under the direction of Scott Edmiston, Jennifer Ellis steps into the role made famous by Julie Andrews and Audrey Hepburn.	How else were you planning to honor the centennial of Shackleton's expedition? Hailed at its stops in New Jersey and Seattle, this two-hander makes its Boston premiere with original leads Valerie Vigoda and Wade McCollum.	She was the greatest female songwriter of the 20th century, so the music is guaranteed to be good. Fun fact: Jessie Mueller won a Tony for the Broadway hit, and her little sister Abby will take over the role during this first U.S. tour	If being family-friendly and seasonally appropriate wasn't enough to draw the kids, consider this: It uses the same source material as Frozen. Former New Rep producing artistic director Rick Lombardo returns to stage this play, which he co-wrote.	This Off Broadway show was a hit when it premiered in 2012, and the immersive production has a reputation for adding a ton of energy to the 19th-century tale of Russian high society

CHOICE WORDS

After working on Choice on and off for six years, acclaimed writer Winnie Holzman will finally see her play make its world premiere Oct. 6–Nov. 15 at the BCA's Calderwood Pavilion. Holzman, who created My So-Called Life and wrote the book for the musical Wicked, chatted with us about her latest creation.

What are you looking forward to most about staging Choice with the Huntington Theatre Company? This is the very first production, so just the idea of seeing it realized in an actual theater with sets. I couldn't be more excited about it. Six years isn't forever, but it's a long time. It's been in my mind for a long time. So to move it out of my mind, and off the page, onto a real set with real actors is great. I've seen readings of it, but it's very different to have a real theater and real audience.

Is there anything you want people to know before they come to the theater? As little as possible. The mood I'm in about the play is that it has mysterious elements, I'm hoping in ways that people will find intriguing. There's definitely comedy in the play. It's a real mix of comedy and drama.

What was the impetus behind having a journalist as the protagonist? It's just how the plot and the ideas of the play unfolded to me. At first she wasn't a journalist, and instead she baked cupcakes. But then it turned out to be that I needed someone who was investigating and had an investigative mind that could follow a story.

TIME IS ON HER SIDE

Time has a tendency to warp around Marilyn Arsem, a veteran performance artist who might take seven hours to slide a glass off a table or eight hours to exit a room. Next, she'll clock in for 100 Ways to Consider Time, a new work that will unfold for six hours a day over 100 days starting Nov. 9 at the Museum of Fine Arts, which has awarded her its 2015 Maud Morgan Prize. "It's essentially 100 different performances about time and how we live through it," Arsem explains. "I'm hoping I'll learn something about time that I don't know. That's the point of making art: to discover something you don't know." In the meantime, she kindly spared a few minutes to chat with us. / Jacqueline Houton

Your work is site-specific and has taken you all over the world. Is there a location still on your wish list? I would really love to work in Antarctica, and I'm afraid that it will melt before I ever get the chance. I'm really interested in that expanse of white and the fact that it extends to the far reaches of your visual field. I think that's a fascinating challenge.

Do any of your past performances stand out as especially challenging? Well, when I did a piece called I Scream in Sweden standing outside [ed. note: while holding 30 liters of peppermint ice cream!], it was actually pouring rain and quite cold. You can't tell from the picture, but I actually had a raincoat on underneath my dress. But I still looked like a drowned rat after the performance. Which was fine. That was actually maybe kind of the point.... It opens up other aspects of the work that I wouldn't anticipate, when I'm faced with challenges like weather, or very active audiences, or when I'm alone for extended periods of time.

How would you describe your work to someone who's unfamiliar with it? I have often encouraged people to look at my work the same way they might look at minimalist sculpture or painting, where the intention of the artist maybe isn't so easily detected, and it actually throws the work back on the viewer in terms of asking them to make use of it in whatever way it might strike them. It's less about trying to tell them something and more about giving them a space to think about the same questions I'm thinking about.

Curators' Corner

Selecting a single work from a must-see exhibit is a tall order for a curator—sort of like choosing a favorite child—but these four obliged us with a small taste of their big fall shows.

"Kent's the juiciest tomato of all is the print that made me realize that her work deserved a much closer look," says Susan Dackerman, curator of the just-opened exhibit Corita Kent and the Language of Pop on view through Jan 3 at the Harvard Art Museums "She was a nun making prints in the 1960s that were clearly and cleverly in dialogue with Warhol's take on pop art, in particular his depiction of tomato products like Campbell's Tomato Soup and Campbell's Tomato Juice. Yet instead of borrowing images from commodity culture to critique it as Warhol and other pop artists did, she used supermarket slogans to update religious imagery... Up close you can see the fine print where she spells out her new image of female divinity: 'Mary Mother is the juiciest tomato of them all.' "

"In 1953, Robert Rauschenberg created Minutiae as a set decoration for Merce Cunningham's new dance (also called Minutiae)," says Ruth Erickson, co-curator of Leap Before You Look: Black Mountain College 1933–1957, on view Oct. 10–Jan. 24 at the Institute of Contemporary Art. "More than any other single work in the exhibition, Rauschenberg's freestanding set decoration exemplifies Black Mountain College's interdisciplinary nurturing of performance and the visual arts. It is composed of paint, newspaper, found objects and fabric on an open wood structure, and dancers literally danced around and through the work. Minutiae points toward where Rauschenberg's artwork would soon go: his invention of a new form of sculpture called 'combines.' AN OPEN BOOK

Home is where the heart is—and where everyone you know is reading your story. At least that's the case for local author and educator Jennifer De Leon, whose "Home Movie," a tale about a Guatemalan family living in Boston, has been selected for the 2015 One City One Story project. Free copies are available online and throughout the city, so readers can dive into an Oct. 24 discussion during the weekendlong Boston Book Festival, which will bring De Leon and more than 150 other presenters—from Margaret Atwood to Amanda Palmer—to Copley Square. But first, De Leon fielded a few of our literary inquiries.

What are you most looking forward to at the festival? Honestly, I'm really looking forward to hearing what complete strangers have to say about my story. It is rare that an author gets to interact with her readers in such a unique format as the Town Hall Story Discussion...I'm excited!

What book have you read repeatedly, and why do you find yourself going back to it? The Circuit by Francisco Jiménez. The autobiographical novel—12 mini stories, really—is narrated by Francisco as a boy soon after he and his parents and two brothers crawl through a wire fence in a Mexican border town at night. So begins their journey on the "circuit" as migrant farmworkers in California in the 1940s. I have taught this book in many of my classes...from college creative writing classes to adult memoir classes and, currently, my 7th- and 8th-grade classes at the Boston Teachers Union School in Jamaica Plain. I return to this book for many reasons—among them, figurative language, exceptional dialogue, imagery, characters in conflict and others—but above all, this is a good book because it tells a good story. People want to know what happens next.

What would your dream library look like? Aside from some ideas that come to mind immediately—laptops, tutors, comfortable couches, open-mic events, creative writing workshops and seminars—are others that are less obvious but would be amazing, [like] being able to take out a class set of novels rather than one or two copies of that novel because so many public schools have tight budgets that don't allow for book purchases of that volume. I would also love to see a library as a space for the whole community, and one that engages and validates all kinds of learning—in and outside of books.

Yuna

This fall, two museums are offering innovative live music series, bringing pop, hip-hop and rock to spaces better known for lowered voices. At the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum, local soul/hip-hop singer Shea Rose and producer Simone Scazzocchio curate RISE, which pairs on-the-rise artists with established musicians for performances in the museum's Calderwood Hall. Meanwhile, Chestnut Hill's Metropolitan Waterworks Museum and Non-Event present Experimental Music in the Great Engines Hall, which invites artists to perform on a most unusual stage amid Victorian pumping engines. That series kicks off Sept. 16 with Australian synth artist John Chantler and composer and media artist Lawrence English. / Alexandra Cavallo

KEY NOTES

Elaine Rombola isn't your average piano tuner. On Nov. 7 and 8 (and then again Jan. 9-10), the local pianist and teacher will insert a variety of unusual objects, including screws, paperclips and erasers, into the strings of the ICA's in-gallery piano, altering the instrument according to the specifications of the late avant-garde composer John Cage (pictured here). "The sound of the instrument, which sounds almost nothing like a piano, just blew my mind," says Rombola, who'll be playing selections from Cage's Sonatas and Interludes as part of her performance, The Prepared Piano. "I'm excited that I might be able to bring that kind of ear-opening experience to some ICA-goers. The sound isn't what you'd expect when you hear there are bolts and screws and pieces of rubber stuck inside the piano. What you hear is actually a lot of delicate but resonant gong sounds—soft clicks and thumps, rattling and buzzing."

HIP TO BE SAD

ICYMI: Emo isn't dead. Proof of this is a host of killer billings, of both new and veteran acts, at venues across town. Mark your calendars and smear your eyeliner for...

Four Year Strong at the Middle East on Oct. 11 The Worcester pop-punk outfit headlines a bill including fellow Bay State act Defeater and Pennsylvania rockers Superheaven. However, genre fans would do well to catch a set by Elder Brother, a side project composed of members of The Story So Far and Daybreaker.

Have Mercy at the Sinclair on Oct. 18 The Baltimore indie/emo outfit will have you feeling all the feelings when they headline a bill also featuring two locally grown acts—emo/pop rockers Transit and emo/alt rockers Somos. Both are worth getting there early to catch.

The Get Up Kids at the Paradise Rock Club on Dec. 8 If you haven't cried along to the Get Up Kids' "Mass Pike," then you might not have a pulse. True, the emo pioneers were actually from Kansas City, but we'll go on the record saying that few other bands have captured the melancholy spirit of a long, late drive home to Boston with a lover quite so poignantly. The Kids don't stop in town on their 20th anniversary tour until December, but you should mark your calendars—and grab your tickets—now.

FAMILY AFFAIR

The Avett Brothers are veterans on the festival circuit. The North Carolina folkies play the kind of chill, easy music that seems tailor-made for breezy outdoor concerts—but don't think that means their Friday night headlining set at Boston Calling (Sept. 25-27) will be low-key. We checked in with co-frontman and guitarist Seth Avett to find out what we can expect.

What do you like best about playing a fest? I like the way it feels like it's easier to get to a more spontaneous place. I think a lot of performers respond and react to the confines of being in an interior space—you know, if you're in a theater and people are wearing button-up shirts that are tucked in, it feels a little more uptight. And that can create a very refined sort of beautiful thing, if you let it, but the great thing about a festival is there are all these sunburned people walking around barefoot and dirty. And it's kind of an easier atmosphere in which to throw down and let mistakes fly and not be too uptight about it.

You just had a new baby—congrats! How do you think fatherhood will affect your life as a touring musician? I can already tell you that it makes it harder to leave. It was hard enough before he was born, and now I have a lot more to miss. But by the same token, it's so inspiring that it sort of balances out in the way of being excited and having words and lyrics and ideas kind of floating around my head. I think there's going to be a balance, artistically, but logistically it's kind of rough.

You've had a new album in the works for some time now, but there's very little out there about it. What can you tell us? I'm sorry to tell you that I can tell you very little about it. [Laughs.] I can tell you that it's either finished in terms of tracking or it's very close to being finished—which means there's still some considering to do, and we're mixing, but we're well, well into the process. I'm hoping that early next year, somewhere around March, will be when we're able to share it with the world.

Classic With a Twist

Today's world-class classical musicians find themselves performing outside of concert halls more and more, serving up traditional music in some very untraditional ways. Four such locals—all dedicated to broadening the reach of the music they love—recently joined The Improper at one unconventional concert venue, Aeronaut Brewery, to chat about what ditching the tuxedo means for classical music as we know it.

EZRA WELLER

We're on Original Gravity's home turf, Keith. Your series pairs new music with drinks from local brewers. How does relaxing a concert's atmosphere change the experience for audience members?

Keith Kirchoff (artistic director of Original Gravity): Traditionally in a jazz concert, you were sitting there with your beer or your cocktail. It just immediately induces this sort of relaxed atmosphere, and I think that you listen better. For Original Gravity, I liked the idea of pairing the beverage with the music so that it's not a background thing. It's not, have a beer while you're listening to music, or we're here at dinner and there's some background music playing. These are actually equal things. To me, jazz had always had that sort of image where it was OK to do that.

Jennifer Montbach (oboist and artistic director of Radius Ensemble): We need to give props to jazz for retaining some of those aspects, not only eating but also connecting with the performers, where you'd clap after a great solo or between movements, which historically was part of classical music too.

KK: In the modern-day traditional classical performance, you're scowled at if you're clapping after a movement. If you love something, if somebody just dazzled you with some great passage, why not clap?

JM: And if something is transcendent, you should be able to sit there for a moment and take it in without feeling like, "Oh, it's time to clap."

Dave Tarantino (percussionist with Phoenix orchestra): People say, "Oh, you can go to the Boston Pops and have food and watch a concert." The Pops are great obviously, but just the fact that it's the Pops, it's kind of pandering to "Here's some popular music because you don't like what we normally do." And to me, that's kind of twisted to frame it like that...

JM: You shouldn't only be allowed to have food when the trumpet players are wearing Santa hats.

The audience for classical music is there—you don't need to change the music. What are some changes you're making to get people in the door?

DT: One is breaking down the barrier between the floor and the stage, so there's not musicians onstage wearing tuxedos and then the audience. Removing the fourth wall with a small group is easier, but with a larger group it allows more interaction.

KK: It gives people the chance to talk to the musicians as well. If there's something that they're curious about, the musicians—and perhaps the composers—are right there. You can just go up and chat with them and realize that they're totally normal people, so it kind of breaks down that barrier as well.

JM: People want to experience their music the way they experience other art forms. They want to know the performers. Why do we buy celebrity magazines and watch reality TV?

Before each of our pieces, our performers will get up and tell a story or read a poem or say, "Listen to this little part in the second movement."

Ezra Weller (COO of Groupmuse): It's nice to have the performance of classical music turn a little bit back into the practice of other music. For example, there's a Groupmuse violinist who comes in and he doesn't know what he's going to play, which is something a folk singer could do, but the music we're playing is not exactly like folk music. It follows different rules. There's a seriousness to Beethoven, and that's not a bad thing. And it's also not the thing that prevents it from having a place today. It might be true that the most popular things are never going to be super serious. It may be true that comedy movies can always be a bigger blockbuster than very serious ones. But 12 Years a Slave can still be a popular movie.

JM: For any other art form, no one would say, "If you like beef bourguignon, you can't have pizza." Right? Not to suggest that one's better than the other, but you can have varied tastes. This whole issue of seriousness is a tricky semantic one, and we want to be careful to retain that respect and seriousness and tradition.

EW: We do nothing to make a Groupmuse a serious thing, but when everybody comes together and sits down and looks at the musicians, you don't have to do anything else to make it more serious. It's a sublime thing; it's obvious to everybody in the room.

JM: But you don't need a tuxedo.

DT: If you come in and play a vigil for a string quartet, you just play it like you should always play it. The audience is going to know that's genuine. If you come in and frame it as accessible—that's another loaded word too...

EW: People think Beethoven or Mozart is hard to understand. It's not hard to understand at all. It uses all the same tools that you hear on pop stations; it's in every movie you've ever watched. Everybody knows this language today. If you just sit down and listen, you'll get it no matter who you are.

What is classical music's place in the 21st century?

JM: We may have done contemporary music a little bit of a disservice by segregating it to its own types of concert series and events. I think there is an audience for capital C classical music that also craves new music. They may not realize it; they may need it explained to them a little bit more. There is this whole idea that music has been corner-stoned, but they're really all part of a continuing spectrum. They inform each other. So when you hear Beethoven next to a contemporary composer, you may understand that music better than if you just heard it isolated.

KK: With Original Gravity, we do only new music. We're working with young composers most of the time. I think a lot of people get scared with what they think modern music is. But when you get them here to listen to it and you get the composer there to chat with them about it, it's not a scary thing. You realize you can relate to this.

"Before each of our pieces, our performers will get up and tell a story or read a poem or say, 'Listen to this little part in the second movement.'"

JM: And I think composers writing today have a broad musical history and aesthetic that composers writing a few hundred years ago did not have. When we talk about the spectrum, it's a tree. It's not just a trunk; it's all these millions of branches. A lot of the composers that are writing for us, you look at their iPods, it's not all classical music. We're commissioning John Harbison in the spring. He met Stravinsky; he was a jazz player. He's not just drawing on the classical cannon—he's drawing on being alive in the 21st century.

EW: There's an argument to be made that where the money comes from has really affected the content itself. At some point in the 19th century, there became a little bit more of a populist element—you had to write something that was going to be successful. And today, you go to school surrounded by a bunch of other people, you're going to write music for the people around you. It's a natural impulse, and that has led somewhat to the separation between contemporary music and classical music. But there's totally hope for it because if you go to these concerts, people are really into the old stuff. And when they say they're going to play a new piece now that just got written, everyone gets excited by that idea. Even if you hate the piece, that's still exciting, but it's only exciting in context of the older stuff too.

Is classical music intimidating?

EW: Everything's intimidating if you're not used to it. If I was to go to a soccer game in Ireland, that would be really intimidating because each team has its own song or stomps and I don't understand any of that stuff. Any time you have a situation like that, it's intimidating. But that doesn't mean that soccer is intimidating.

JM: But I think we need to give audiences a little credit, especially millennials. It's amazing seeing people be open to new experiences. But they also smell the bullshit a mile away. If you can give it to them in a way that feels authentic, they're going to be open to receiving it. It's our responsibility to curate it, and they let us lead them through. Kids are graduating from conservatories now, and instead of expecting to take auditions for major orchestras and have a job for life, they're now more entrepreneurial. When I graduated 20 years ago, I was that weirdo who didn't want to take auditions. I wanted to create something. Now I see a lot more kids who know that they're going to have to write their own ticket.

DT: In all of these endeavors, everyone's trying to keep the artistic level really high. That's number one, and a close second—or maybe tied—is trying to get that to open up to more people.

You all prove that you can have high-quality music and present it in a different way. Jennifer, Radius Ensemble is in its 17th season. What changes over the years stick out?

JM: When I started the group, when people asked what's special about Radius, they'd say, "Get this: They have a website." This is 1999. But, you know, not wearing black, speaking during concerts, a lot of these things are becoming more and more commonplace, and I'm finding that very refreshing.

Dave, Phoenix is in its second season. What did you see missing that you felt like the group could add?

DT: I was roommates with Matt, the music director. This idea started when he had assistant conductor auditions, and he kept thinking, "I would love to have one of these jobs, but even if I had one, I don't know if I'd like it." So as a classical percussionist, as a conductor, you just think, what can I do to make more opportunities for musicians like me that are related to our lives? That was inspired by going to a lot of more traditional concerts. As music students, we're bred to understand whatever the stuffy atmosphere is and still enjoy it. But going away from those concerts, there's not really enough there.

Ezra, you're trying to get people involved so that hosting a Groupmuse in your living room is not just a novelty thing you might do once or twice but a way of getting to know the musicians in your community. What's the benefit of building those relationships?

EW: I think of it like farmers markets. Wouldn't it be great if on every block there was a little farmstand and you got vegetables? On every block there is a musician who can play you music. Wouldn't it be nice to have the people on that block come together once or twice a month and just chill out and listen to this guy play? It's just a way of bringing your community together, which is something I certainly feel a lack of. A lot of neighborhoods that I travel around in and live in, people don't really know each other anymore. But I think that it's something people miss, and they want to connect with people that they live around.

There are a lot of ensembles in this city that want a wider audience, but you're all sitting here because you're really dedicated to making it happen, and I think that will trickle down.

KK: Quite honestly, part of the impetus behind starting Original Gravity was even though these new music concerts around town were fairly well-attended, I was still seeing more or less the same people. There's nothing wrong with having a hardcore following, but there's so many other people who would actually get into this that aren't coming. And there's the hope that maybe people do attend a traditional concert.

DT: One of the beginning concepts for us was that we can be like a gateway drug to all of the people who come to these kind of concerts. Maybe one day they're ready for that really traditional BSO experience. In terms of introduction, it's more of an ecosystem. We can all rise together. There's this whole untapped community out there. ◆

IT TAKES A VILLAGE

Original Gravity isn't the only concert series at Aeronaut. From Thursday's Funk & Flights to third Friday's Bites, Beats and Beamers, live performances flow almost as often as the beer.

Then there's Duck Village Stage, spearheaded by the Somerville brewery's first customer, Randy Winchester, who has also spent time behind the bar and in the lab as an intern while working toward a biotechnology graduate certificate at Boston University. Now, he finds himself booking acts for Duck Village, much in the same way he's pulled together 300 shows in the past eight years for the Nave Gallery's music series.

"I have a curatorial philosophy that's a win-win for everyone," Winchester says. His goal in both endeavors: Open doors for musicians looking for a place to play without shelling out their own money. Donations cover enough to keep the venue's lights on, and then the rest goes to the performers.

As for the Wednesday night series' namesake, he explains that it's a nod to a little-known nearby historic area. "During Prohibition, because of all the twisted little reeds back there, people could duck the authorities, so bootleggers and speakeasies popped up."

Since June, Duck Village has put on concerts with ensembles like Quartet Kalos and the Fourth Wall as well as Voice contestant Amanda Lee Peers; two versions of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream and a reading of a musical have also graced the stage. Soon, saxophonist Dennis Shafer will perform his multimedia spectacular RendrGrom, complete with a 12-by-18-foot pyramid projection screen. Fitted with microphones, the tap room is even wired for recording and live streaming.

"It's all part of [Aeronaut cofounder Ben Holmes'] plan of making this a community," Winchester says. "This isn't just a tap room; it's a public house. That's the way this place is being run."

AGENDA for 9/16–9/29

Fluff Yeah!

A sweet celebration.

UNION SQUARE IS currently home to a number of fine bars and restaurants (and maybe one day it will be home to its own T stop), but for fans of sticky marshmallow goodness, the 'hood will always first and foremost be home to one thing: the birthplace of Fluff. And that's something to fest about. Now in its 10th year, the What the Fluff? festival is a gloriously gratuitous celebration featuring Fluff cocktails from area bars, a gallery show of (we presume) Fluff art, a Fluff cook-off, Fluff games, burlesque by the Flufferettes (aka Rogue Burlesque) and, of course, enough sweet Fluff treats to keep your dentist up at night. This year's theme is Fluff-X, marking a decade of Fluffdom—so X will mark the spot on Sept. 26 when the festival takes over Union Square. Alexandra Cavallo

The What the Fluff? festival runs from 3 to 7 pm on Sept. 26 in Union Square, Somerville. Free. unionsquaremain.org/fluff_festival

PIE IN THE SKY

Life isn't always as sweet as pie, as the title character in Waitress knows all too well. Adapted from the 2007 film starring Keri Russell, the A.R.T.'s musical follows a small-town waitress trapped in a loveless marriage to an abusive man. Finding herself further bound by an unwanted pregnancy, she dreams of winning a local pie contest—and the prize money that would fund her escape—until a charming doctor moves to town, turning her life upside down. With a cast of quirky characters led by star Jessie Mueller and music and lyrics by Sara Bareilles, this Diane Paulus-directed production is headed for Broadway, but there's still time to take a bite: It plays through Sept. 27 at the Loeb Drama Center. Alexandra Cavallo

GET A CLUE It's been 20 years since the debut of Clueless, a cinematic gem about a fashion-forward virgin who doesn't know how to drive but nonetheless successfully navigates the drama of her Beverly Hills high school, "earning" straight A's while practicing philanthropy, surviving robbery at gunpoint and landing herself an ex-stepbrother beau. In addition to her good nature, Alicia Silverstone's Cher also possessed one of the most enviable closets of our time, coveted by '90s girls and current college freshmen alike (even though the latter likely style themselves ironically—as if!). So put on your most capable-looking outfit to catch a screening on Sept. 17 at the Coolidge Corner Theatre, followed by a Rewind! afterparty across the street at Osaka. Meghan Kavanaugh PHOTO: PARAMOUNT PICTURES / PHOTOFEST

Reviews by Brett Michel

AMY ★★★1/2 I didn't know much about the late Amy Winehouse's music before watching this heartbreaking documentary from Asif Kapadia, but I was mourning her by the end. Kapadia's last picture was the 2010 doc Senna, about another talent who died too soon, Brazilian F1 driver Ayrton Senna. But it seems that was just the qualifying lap for this devastating portrait of the soulful singer who died from alcohol poisoning nearly four years ago at the age of 27. Given how much of a punch line Winehouse had become because of her public drunkenness (an infamous outdoor music festival in Serbia where she was too intoxicated to sing is shown here to powerful effect), I was one of many who wasn't surprised by her death. But Kapadia has vindicated her tremendously, compiling warts-and-all footage—much of it shot on camcorders and cellphones by some of her closest friends and enablers—that begins when she was a 14-year-old Jewish girl in North London. The first footage we see was shot at a birthday party, where we hear her gorgeous voice. "Life is short," Amy says on camera at one point. Indeed, tragically. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

ANT-MAN ★★★ With nearly every superhero movie climaxing with gigantic things crashing into other things, it's a tiny thrill to see the climactic sequence of Marvel's latest take place within a little girl's bedroom. Then again, when you're a hero who shrinks to the size of an ant, even a Thomas the Tank Engine toy seems imposing when barreling toward you. But cut to a wider view of the action, as director Peyton Reed does, and the small scale begets big laughs, another welcome wrinkle in the spandex-suit genre. It's doubtful Ant-Man will be as lucrative as Marvel's last big gamble, Guardians of the Galaxy, but it offers a fair amount of modest pleasures, beginning with the cast. Paul Rudd stars as Scott Lang, a small-time thief with a Robin Hood ethos. Recruited by septuagenarian scientist Hank Pym (Michael Douglas, remarkably de-aged during a 1989-set prologue), who supplies him with his suit and tech, Lang is Marvel's first blue-collar hero. He's also granted a refreshingly unexpected sidekick: Michael Peña's ex-con Luis, who almost steals the movie with his hilarious digressions. "Ant-Man will return," promises a tag after a second end-credit scene. Here's hoping they don't make him any bigger. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

FANTASTIC FOUR ★ In this third attempt at launching a Fantastic Four film franchise, director Josh Trank cast Michael B. Jordan, the talented young black actor who costarred in his low-budget debut film, 2012's Chronicle, to portray Johnny Storm, upsetting some comic fans who were used to a blond-haired, blue-eyed Human Torch. But Jordan proves an inspired choice, as do Kate Mara as Johnny's sister Sue (the Invisible Woman), Jamie Bell as Ben Grimm (the boulder-skinned Thing) and Miles Teller, Jordan's That Awkward Moment costar, as Reed Richards (Mr. Fantastic), the group's paternal leader. But here's the thing: Reed's not a patriarchal figure in this retelling, which adopts The Dark Knight's brooding, ostensibly real-world vibe. In this needlessly modern update, there's little room for family, since all of the characters are teenagers. We never see them learn to harness their powers—or even interact with one another until the less-than-fantastic final act, when Reed is convinced to resume work on an interdimensional teleporter that's done nothing but cause harm. "They made it ugly," he observes, taking in what's happened to the device responsible for creating this version of the Fantastic Four. They sure did. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

THE GIFT ★★★1/2 Simon (Jason Bateman) and Robyn (Rebecca Hall) move to his hometown of Los Angeles, where they hope to start a family in their spacious new home. A chance encounter with one of Simon's high school classmates becomes just the first of many, as "Gordo the weirdo" (Joel Edgerton) inserts himself into the married couple's lives. When he increasingly shows up on their doorstep, Robyn begins to take a liking to the oddball, but Simon won't have it. Clearly, there's a history between Simon and Gordo, and as Robyn pieces together the details of the two's past relationship, an unsettling truth begins to emerge. Edgerton demonstrates a deft hand at manipulating audience expectations in his writing and directing debut. The 41-year-old Aussie, who has built a strong acting resume during the past two decades, proves that he's just as strong behind the camera, and that's no surprise since he's worked for Ridley Scott (Exodus: God and Kings) and Kathryn Bigelow (Zero Dark Thirty). The result is one of the year's better psychological thrillers. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

GRANDMA ★★★1/2 Unseen in a lead film role since Big Business in '88, Lily Tomlin's enjoying one hell of a year. First, there was her hit Netflix series, Grace and Frankie. Now, the 76-year-old actress and comedian stars in this modest and unexpectedly emotional little gem as Elle, a poet who hasn't published in decades. Elle currently has about $40 to her name, so what's she to do when her granddaughter Sage (Julia Garner) shows up unannounced needing $630 before sundown? Why, set off on an 8-hour journey in her antique Dodge Royal as the two drop in on Cam (Nat Wolff), Sage's deadbeat boyfriend and part of the reason for her troubles. They also visit a couple of Elle's old friends (played by Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox and the late Elizabeth Peña), but it's the encounters with two of Elle's exes that gives the movie much of its heft. Sam Elliott is devastating as Karl, the man she wronged decades before, while Judy Greer—playing Olivia, the younger woman Elle's recently broken up with—is finally given a role to shine in after playing the token mom in three of this summer's blockbusters. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Learning to Drive ★★1/2 Patricia Clarkson is a treasure, but like most actresses of a certain age in Hollywood, she's in need of better scripts. Not that Isabel Coixet's comedy/drama is a bad film—it's better than most pictures that have opened in the past month—but its story of a middle-aged Manhattan book critic taking lessons from a Sikh instructor drives down a very predictable path. Clarkson is Wendy, whose husband of 21 years (Jake Weber) has just left her. Deciding to spend more time with her daughter Tasha (Grace Gummer) in Vermont, Wendy must get a car, but first she needs a license, which is where the lessons with Darwan (Ben Kingsley) come in. He's a cabbie, an American citizen originally from India, and he's being pushed into an arranged marriage. Sarah Kernochan's stagey script is all very sitcomy, but Clarkson and Kingsley (who appeared together in Coixet's Elegy back in 2008) make the situations go down easy as the two help each other to get back on the sometimes-bumpy road of life. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Man from U.N.C.L.E. ★★★ The unexpected year of the espionage movie continues with director Guy Ritchie's big-screen reimagining of this 1964-68 TV series. Breezier than the recent Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation, this prequel set in the early '60s suffers slightly by comparison, but it's still quite a bit of fun. Ritchie and co-screenwriter Lionel Wigram (his collaborator on the Robert Downey Jr. Sherlock Holmes films) enjoy paying homage to James Bond just as much as Matthew Vaughn did with Kingsman: The Secret Service and Paul Feig did with Spy. The tone is nearly as comical as those two pictures, while the style is pure Ritchie. Equal-opportunity casting finds Brit Henry Cavill (Man of Steel) starring as American CIA operative Napoleon Solo, while American Armie Hammer (The Lone Ranger) plays slap-prone KGB agent Illya Kuryakin. The two put aside cold-war hostilities (if not tensions) to team up in this surprisingly low-tech thriller, picking up a rocket scientist's daughter (Alicia Vikander) in their mission to stop—you guessed it—an international criminal organization. Spectre, the upcoming, dour-looking Bond picture, could probably spy some tips on how to lighten up from these entertaining men from U.N.C.L.E. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation ★★★1/2 How does Tom Cruise's Ethan Hunt outrun so many bullets? One of the many pleasures of Christopher McQuarrie's spy film focusing on the exploits of Hunt and his team, the Impossible Missions Force, is that he doesn't. In this fifth installment of a 19-year-old series that keeps getting better with age, Ethan takes at least one in the gut, reminding you that while he may be great at his job, he's even better when things don't go according to plan. None of the exploits of the IMF look easy, and the fact that 53-year-old Cruise is finally starting to show (and ever-so-slightly play) his age only makes his insane physical feats that much more thrilling to watch. The crazy suits him. And it doesn't get much crazier than the sight of Cruise clinging onto the outside of a flying plane, a stunt that has been at the center of this film's marketing campaign. But the biggest surprise? This is just the curtain-raiser, occurring during the first 10 minutes. The movie's plot involves a rogue anti-IMF organization known as the Syndicate, but their mission is foolish. Why deprive audiences of what's become the best action franchise out there? (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

MISTRESS AMERICA ★★★ This film enjoyed the best advance buzz of the two pictures that Noah Baumbach directed this year (While We're Young opened last spring), but viewers' mileage may vary. He reunites with his offscreen partner, Greta Gerwig, who cowrites and costars, but the two had better success with their first big collaboration, 2012's Frances Ha, which followed a post-grad drifting through New York. This time, Gerwig cedes center stage to lonely college freshman Tracy (Lola Kirke), whose university experience isn't taking shape as she'd imagined. The guy she likes in her writing class (Matthew Shear) started dating someone else after he and Tracy began hanging out, which is just another day in Manhattan for her. However, her disappointment dissipates when she falls under the wing of her soon-to-be stepsister, Brooke (Gerwig), who's as much a dreamer as Frances—but even more of a mess. In short, Brooke's a great model for the fiction that Tracy's writing. The life lessons are backed by Britta Phillips' and Dean Wareham's synth-heavy score, which would have fit right in with Baumbach's 1995 debut, Kicking and Screaming, another film set among college intellectuals. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

SOUTHPAW ★★1/2 Last year, Jake Gyllenhaal delivered a knockout performance in Nightcrawler, which found him dropping 30 pounds, causing his eyes to pop from his gaunt, haunted face. It was a wonderfully wormy performance, and it was snubbed during Oscar season. In director Antoine Fuqua's latest, Gyllenhaal performs literal knockouts, bulking up to portray anger-prone boxer Billy "The Great" Hope, who's been with his wife, Maureen (Rachel McAdams), since they met at an orphanage. Now, they live in luxury, along with their bright young daughter, Leila (newcomer Oona Laurence). Alas, tragedy strikes as Maureen is caught in the crossfire during an altercation between Billy and a showboating boxer (Miguel Gómez). Billy loses everything: his wife, his money, his home—and his daughter, who's taken by family services. But since the movie is structured as Billy's redemption tale, the gifted Laurence is little more than a prop in a rote script that pushes Gyllenhaal's prize performance against the ropes. Fuqua, who brought out the darkness in Denzel Washington when he directed the actor toward an Oscar in Training Day, does the same with Gyllenhaal. Alas, the foundation behind Billy's Light Heavyweight Champ is far more lightweight than heavy. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Straight Outta Compton ★★★ F. Gary Gray's film has been burning up the box office, and why not? His chronicle of the five young men who rose above their upbringing in Compton, California, begins in 1987, but it captures the zeitgeist of the Black Lives Matter movement: The police who constantly drive through the frame, threatening to keep our young black heroes in their place, serves to remind us that as much as some things change, most things painfully remain the same. The cast is uniformly terrific in this portrayal of the rise of subversive "gangsta rap" group N.W.A.—made up of Ice Cube (O'Shea Jackson Jr., the real Ice Cube's son), Dr. Dre (Corey Hawkins), Eazy-E (Jason Mitchell), DJ Yella (Neil Brown Jr.) and MC Ren (Aldis Hodge)—who stand up to authority by creating angry anthems such as "Fuck tha Police," which Gray (Ice Cube's director in 1995's Friday) and his writers stage here as a direct response to the group nearly being arrested outside their recording studio simply for being black in the wrong place. Sure, the movie is hagiographic and overstuffed, but like the group, it's electric and not easily silenced. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Trainwreck ★★1/2 TV sensation Amy Schumer brings her caustic humor to the big screen in director Judd Apatow's latest, and while she wrote the script, it suffers from most of the same detriments as Apatow's films, which include The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Knocked Up. It's overlong and indulgent, and although it mines laughs from the abhorrent behavior it seems to be celebrating, it ultimately sides with a very conservative view of the world. If you're a viewer of Schumer's sketch-based Comedy Central show, you can imagine that this creative marriage might go sour—and you'd be right. The movie opens in 1993, when Gordon Townsend (Colin Quinn), who's being kicked out by his wife, drills a mantra into his 5- and 9-year-old daughters: "Monogamy isn't realistic." Cut to the present, where Amy (Schumer), the older of the two girls, has embraced her father's teachings, enjoying her uninhibited and commitment-free lifestyle while teasing her younger sister (Brie Larson), who's embraced a traditional marriage. But then, she meets a successful sports doctor (Bill Hader, who's developing a nice post-SNL movie career), and predictable conventionality takes over. No doubt, Schumer's a star, but she's stuck here playing what she typically mocks. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

The Transporter Refueled ★ The villains in this fourth Transporter film claim they've been working together for 15 years—after the movie's prologue shows them doing evil deeds together in 1995. Clearly, the filmmakers aren't good with basic math, never mind making a movie. In fact, this entire 96-minute Audi ad feels like a test drive for something that should have starred Jason Statham, who took the lead in the previous installments of this goofy action series. His Frank Martin is greatly missed; for a series that feels like a low-rent James Bond on wheels, newcomer Ed Skrein's Frank is like Timothy Dalton to Statham's Sean Connery. Director Camille Delamarre (Brick Mansions) apparently recognized this, so he's supplied Frank with a father, Frank Sr. This sometime sidekick is played by underrated actor Ray Stevenson, who projects more charisma being held hostage on a couch than Skrein does in the entire film. The plot involves four prostitutes (led by Loan Chabanol) intent on taking down their old pimp (Radivoje Bukvic) through a major heist, while forcing Frank to act as their getaway driver. The real robbery, however, would be getting you to pay to see this piffle. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

A Walk in the Woods ★1/2 Based on travel writer Bill Bryson's 1998 best-seller, a comedic chronicle of his hike through the 2,118-mile Appalachian Trail with old friend Stephen Katz while both were in their late 40s, this adventure comedy from director Ken Kwapis (The Sisterhood of the Traveling Pants) gives both adventure and comedy a bad name. Casting much older actors as Bryson (79-year-old Robert Redford) and Katz (74-year-old Nick Nolte) might have looked good on paper, but the relaxed Redford and antic Nolte are about as believable as friends as a pairing of Gore Vidal and William F. Buckley would be—but with even less chemistry. Redford and Nolte spend a good deal of the third act stranded on a ledge after they've tumbled off a cliff (Kwapis loves his pratfalls), but the ledge is clearly on a soundstage, carved out of foam and painted, Star Trek-style, then composited into a real location. These pieces fit together about as well as Redford and Nolte do. "There are these things called books," Bryson tells Katz at one point. "They're like TV, for smart people." You're better off reading Bryson's travelogue than slogging through the wilderness with these two for 104 interminable minutes. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

We Are Your Friends ★ This itty-bitty I Vitelloni also takes its cue from Saturday Night Fever, but the navel-gazing nightlife among friends Cole (Zac Efron), Mason (Jonny Weston), Ollie (Shiloh Fernandez) and Squirrel (Alex Shaffer) moves from the dance clubs of Brooklyn to the nightclubs and outdoor music fests of Hollywood, where casual drug use is presented without comment. The digital rotoscope animation used to represent the effects of PCP may be one of the worst onscreen representations of a trip that I've ever witnessed, although it's no less false than casting Efron to represent the face of the EDM scene. "All you need is a laptop, a little bit of talent and one song," Cole says near the beginning of this debut feature from Max Joseph (an actor/producer from Catfish: The TV Show). Then the 23-year-old wannabe DJ demonstrates that there's actually no talent required as he's taken under the wing of James (beardo Wes Bentley), a burnt-out hack whose gorgeous younger girlfriend Sophie ("Blurred Lines" model Emily Ratajkowski) will soon fall for our hero, souring the teacher/mentor relationship. If that sounds like a spoiler to you, you deserve this movie. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

MUSIC

Edited by Sarah Hagman

TUNED UP Inspiration comes in all forms—just ask Tune-Yards' Merrill Garbus. The Smith grad and trained puppeteer has squeezed creative juice from everything from Pee-wee's Playhouse to jazzercise to video games. But don't be fooled by the glitter bombs and electro-pop dance beats—Garbus sings about social injustices and natural disasters, among other serious subjects. For her latest effort, she even visited Haiti for intensive voodoo drum and dance training, though the album's title, Nikki Nack, plays to the group's whimsical demeanor with a nod to nursery rhyme "This Old Man." Play along at Blue Hills Bank Pavilion on Sept. 23, when Tune-Yards opens for the Decemberists. Sarah Hagman PHOTO: HOLLY ANDRES

MUSEUMS & GALLERIES

Edited by Sarah Hagman

BIGGER PICTURE Curators Renée Mussai and Mark Sealy did some serious digging for the latest exhibit at Harvard's Hutchins Center for African & African American Research. Black Chronicles II made its way here from London, where the pair pulled from 40 million negatives in Getty Images' Hulton Archive to uncover portraits of black subjects—some of which have been under wraps for more than a century. There are shots of African Choir members snapped while the group was in England to perform for Queen Victoria, a still of the monarch's goddaughter, Sarah Forbes Bonetta, and photos of boxing champ Peter Jackson and lion-and-tiger tamer Saragano Alicamousa, to name a few highlights. Check out some less-familiar chapters of Victorian history at the center's Cooper Gallery, where Black Chronicles II is on view through Dec. 11 / Sarah Hagman

OH, GOOD LORD

WHAT I DID ON MY SUMMER VACATION.

BEING BOTH LOUD AND A FAN OF GOING eommando, I've always been fond of bagpipes and kilts, so when my brother proposed a family vacation in Scotland, I enthusiastieally agreed. A bonus eame shortly before leaving, when I reeeived an offer from Highland Titles: For roughly $47, you ean eonserve a single square foot of forest in Scotland, and with ownership eomes the legal right to call yourself a lord.

So I arrived in Edinburgh as a Lord of Glencoe, whieh I tried to proclaim at customs, but no one eared. My family was marginally more enthusiastic when I showed them the official papers at dinner that night: They laughed and then went back to looking for a Wi-Fi signal. My nephew did offer to call me "Lord Nonnie," which is as much respeet as my new title got.

Edinburgh was in the midst of the annual madness known as the Festival Fringe. We battled the hordes at the eastle, where Mary, Queen of Seots, gave birth to King James, and saw the fireworks that followed the Military Tattoo. We went up Arthur's Seat (not nearly as dirty as it sounds), used the loo at Holyrood Palace (only so I eould say I peed in one of the queen's toilets) and drank exeessive amounts of seoteh in bars older than Boston. We went to the Best of the Fest, a lineup of top comedians, one of whom had a Glaswegian accent so thiek I eouldn't understand a word he said, but he was still hilarious.

Through Oliver's Travels—a U.K.-based eompany that leases spectaeular eastles, villas and luxury homes throughout Europe—we rented Duns Castle, a jaw-dropping 14th-eentury heap in the Borders. (It doubles for Balmoral in the film Mrs. Brown.) Our hosts were the incomparably hospitable Laird and Lady Alick and Aline Hay, and I quiekly got eomfortable (or drunk) enough to tell them about my title, which elieited a wan smile. We dined with them in the evening and during the day enjoyed country pursuits, like shooting elay pigeons, hiking in the forest and lounging around the drawing room drinking exeessive amounts of scotch. It was all very Downton Abbey, which, ironically, Aline drew one night as a elue in eharades. She simply pointed at the floor. A talented ehef, she prepared feasts of lamb, salmon, tenderloin and crab souffié, which were served in the baronial splendor of a highly ornate dining room. The billiard room was in a Gothie keep dating to 1320, with walls thiek enough that the Hays were spared our late-night shenanigans. We visited a twee fishing village ealled Eyemouth for fish and chips and learned that they crown an annual Herring Queen, which my sister-in-law unkindly pointed out was more impressive than my title. We had luneh in the charming market town of Kelso, whieh has a ruined abbey straight out of a Hiteheoek film, and toured a spectacular garden along the River Tweed.

All too soon, we bid the Hays a reluctant adieu and returned to Edinburgh to board the Belmond Royal Seotsman, a train so absurdly luxurious that Queen Vietoria would've felt right at home. A bagpiper escorted us to the platform at Waverley Station, where tourists took our pieture as we boarded. Then it was off to the Highlands. Our host was a retired brigadier named Ian Gardiner, a most genial man—even when saying things like "I fought in three wars and planned a fourth"—who could reeite Robert Burns as beautifully as I've ever heard it done. The staff was literally flawless, holding trays of Champagne every time we returned from an outing and making sure we had everything we could ask for while sitting in the beautifully appointed observation car.

We passed Perth, traveling through unpronounceable towns into the Cairngorms National Park, where we went fly-fishing on a loch on Rothiemurehus Estate. We went to Inverness and saw Culloden Battlefield. We saw the heather in full bloom and visited the Strathisla Distillery, famous for producing the distinct flavor profile of Chivas Regal. As eharming as all this was, though, the best part was the veritable Agatha Christie east of eharaeters: a few English toffs, an Australian oil magnate and his wife, a hilarious Israeli couple, a 90-year-old woman and her 88-year-old sister, who still runs a bank in Valley Forge, Pennsylvania, and a family from New York whose teens were more interesting than most adults I've met.

The trauma of leaving sueh luxury was softened by an inexplieable upgrade to first elass on our flight home (thank you, B.A.!), and the whole adventure was top-noteh. This Lord of Gleneoe will undoubtedly return, exeept next time, I'll paek sunsereen. I'm probably the only man in history to return from Seotland with a sunburn. ◆

DIG IN!

WHEN I THINK ABOUT memorable meals, I realize most have been ones that bookended the day: the 10-course tasting experience that stretched late into the night; the world's most delicious peanut-butter sandwich, devoured at midnight in my best friend's kitchen after an exhausting, exhilarating day in New York; the full Irish breakfast, complete with to-die-for pan-fried soda bread, I ate on the morning I saw the thatched cottages where my grandparents grew up in Donegal.

So, for our Fall Dining issue, we decided to clock in for a closer look at two culinary time zones. First, the staff explores late-night dining in Boston, tagging along with some chefs after shift, tapping tales from a 24-hour bakery and rounding up standout late-night bites on menus right now. Not to neglect the most important meal of the day, Elizabeth Bomze digs into delish breakfast dishes around town that reflect a wide range of cultural traditions (and are, of course, just the thing for a late night's morning after).

Elsewhere, Jonathan Soroff interviews James Beard Award-winning chef, author and TV personality Joanne Weir, fresh off the release of her new cookbook. Sarah Hagman finds out why a local toque is lugging gallons of seawater from Scituate every two weeks, and I get a look at some jellyfish-laced(!) cupcakes. Meanwhile, Alayna Eberhart sets a very stylish table, Matt Martinelli gets a first taste of Michael Schlow's new Greek restaurant, and Mopsy Strange Kennedy reads up on some Shakespearean sips and snacks. Bon appetit.

SEASONED TO TASTE

MAKING WAVES WITH HOUSEMADE SEA SALT

STEP ONE

Filtered seawater is boiled down during the course of a week. It could be done more quickly, but Sheehan says: "Then I would have very fine grains of salt, which is not exactly what we're looking for."

STEP TWO

The "salty slush" is reduced further as it's placed in a pan and dehydrated for a few more days.

STEP THREE

"I think of our salt as spicier, with almost a little more abrasive flavor to it," Sheehan says of the final product. "Tasting it side by side, there are significant differences."

AGAINST THE GRAIN: Chef Marc Sheehan at Loyal Nine, an entrant on Bon Appetit's 2015 list of the country's best new restaurants.

A Chef Worth His Salt

Cambridge restaurant Loyal Nine preserves more than 18th-century culinary traditions. Chef Marc Sheehan busily brines, cures, confits and ferments many components of his Colonial-inspired dishes, and it all boils down to what he says is the restaurant's primary seasoning: salt. "We use it a lot more to layer and build flavors than we do to just season something," Sheehan says. "To a certain extent, it's the most crucial ingredient we use." And it's important enough that he set out to make his own. "I like that the restaurant has the ability to influence the taste, even down to an elemental level," Sheehan explains, adding that it's also an excuse to occasionally escape the kitchen to his favorite beach.

Every two weeks, Sheehan wades into North Scituate's waters to fill a 30-quart Cambro storage container. Back in Cambridge, a pot is kept on a pilot light for a week to reduce the solution as slowly as possible. (While it could be done in three or four hours, Sheehan prefers the lengthier approach's larger salt crystals.) Next, the resulting slush is transferred to a dehydrator for a few days, and then the quart-and-a-half yield is stored in airtight containers. By the time the two-week process plays out, it's back to Scituate.

Making sea salt comes with challenges beyond the time commitment, from freezing winter temperatures to car seats sloshing with seawater on drives back to the city. But the ability to control the texture, moisture and crystal size makes it worthwhile for Sheehan, who says the housemade seasoning shines on dishes like the fried soldier beans, where it's one of just three components. The salt is also a finishing touch on each order that lands in front of guests, a salute to the local waters that helped influence his seafood-heavy menu. "I wanted to honor that area for what it had done for me in terms of creativity," Sheehan says, "so that every dish that left the restaurant would have a part of that." / Sarah Hagman

GREEK CHIC

MICHAEL SCHLOW OFFERS A FRESH TAKE AT DORETTA.

Doretta Taverna & Raw Bar
Heritage on the Garden,
79 Park Plaza, Boston
(617-422-0008) darettaboston.com

MICHAEL SCHLOW BELIEVES HE HAS solved the Greek crisis. No, not that Greek crisis—save that for Angela Merkel and the rest of the EU. We're talking about Boston's shortage of top-notch Greek restaurants. Enter Doretta Taverna & Raw Bar, set to open by the end of September in the Heritage on the Garden building.

"It's not that we didn't have any Greek restaurants, but they were more mom-and-pop," Schlow says. "Or lots of restaurants say they're Mediterranean. We are unabashedly Greek. We're using a lot of the recipes that haven't been well represented in this city. It's all about fresh products, simply prepared."

The menu has sections for raw bar, spreads, small plates, meat and fish entrees and sides. Some plates update Greek favorites, like a family recipe of chicken braised in tomato, cinnamon and butter; Schlow tweaked the presentation and balance of ingredients, adding a touch of puffed black rice on top. The kitchen also experimented with zucchini chips until it found the proper crisp, but Schlow plans on giving the grilled octopus dish a traditional treatment.

"Sometimes food doesn't need my interpretation to make it better," he says. "There would be nothing better than people from Greece saying, 'I feel like I'm eating at home.' When we were testing out dishes, I had this one Greek couple come in, and I cooked for them. And they said, 'It's better than home.' "

But Schlow wants the atmosphere to appeal to more than just Greek natives. Pronunciation-phobes will find all the dishes listed by their ingredients rather than the Greek names. And you won't find the expected blue-and-white color scheme or Lithos font at Doretta, whose space, formerly home to Schlow's Via Matta, has undergone a major transformation. The entrance is in a more accessible spot, with an awning, patio plants and an illuminated painting marking the way for patrons. ("For 13 years, I watched as everyone went to every single door except for the actual front door," Schlow muses.) In the center of the space is a zinc-topped 28-seat bar, which will serve Greek-inspired cocktails with an emphasis on citrus and spices. The left side of the restaurant is now a food station displaying salad, dessert and raw items. And above the wood tables and cracked-leather banquettes along the rear wall is a 60-foot mural hand-painted by Schlow's wife, Adrienne, who created all the art in the restaurant.

"My wife has been painting for years, but she started doing professional stuff 20 months ago," Schlow says. "She's like my own in-house artist."

The busy restaurateur promises he'll be putting his own touch on the kitchen, donning an apron whenever he's in town. It's something that Bostonians looking for more Greek cuisine will be happy to hear.

"Maybe we're the first in this focused area, but we won't be the last," Schlow says. "This is a high-energy, high-impact food. You're going to see more come."

TAKING IN THE TRASH

FROM THE STRIPED MULLET TO the bearded brotula, there's a special class of fish that are underutilized, underloved and just plain unpopular. Many are scooped up alongside more desirable fish and then tossed back in the water. Another case in point: the lionfish, which is invasive, eats other fish and has no natural predators. To fishermen and chefs, they're "trash fish," and although some decry the term as pejorative, it sticks like fish-sticks. It's simply "a hot-button phrase," says Michael Leviton, chef/owner at Newton's Lumiere. Leviton is a longtime champion of sustainability, especially when it comes to seafood.

And so, two years after the publication of The Chefs Collaborative Cookbook—for which Leviton wrote an introductory essay—he's working on a cookbook tentatively titled Trash Fish: Hidden Treasures from the Ocean to Your Table. Among the varieties, Leviton says he has "no particular favorite," as it depends on the season, catch method and availability. His goal isn't just to share recipes; ultimately, Leviton says he'd like the book to play a role in increasing momentum toward sustainable zero-bycatch fishing, in which the entire edible catch is used. Leviton is still fishing for a publisher: "The proposal is out there, and we've had a few nibbles, pardon the pun."

FEELING SALTY: Josh Turka takes over as executive chef at the Salty Pig.

YOUNG TURK

JOSH TURKA HAS BEEN NAMED EXECUTIVE CHEF at The Salty Pig. Turka, whose background includes a stint at B&G Oysters, was most recently sous-chef under Kevin O'Donnell. The latter will take the reins at SRV, another CODA Group restaurant, when it opens in November. Turka has some unusual qualifications: He earned a master's degree in geology and worked as an English teacher in Italy, where he discovered his true passion was cooking, rather than rocks.

Australian singer dancer and comedian Meow Meow has worked with esteemed choreographer Pina Bausch performed with internationally acclaimed symphonies, earned props from David Bowie and shared stages with Amanda Palmer whom she counts as a dear friend. But she'll be solo for An Audience with Meow Meow a one-woman show playing at the Cutler Majestic Theatre Oct 8-24. We caught up with Meow Meow before curtain time. / Alexandra Cavallo

YOUR PERFORMANCE STYLE IS VERY UNIQUE. DESCRIBE WHAT YOU DO IN YOUR OWN WORDS. I describe this as kamikaze performance because it's pretty relentless—in a hilarious way, I hope. It's sort of a mixture of high art and low art, really, and I like to jump between all of them and kind of assault the audience with as many attacks as I can, in the most loving, theatrical way. I'm a huge fan of opera and Schubert and Schumann, and I like to mix that in with Radiohead. Why not?

WHERE DO YOU FIND INSPIRATION? I'm very influenced by people like Cindy Sherman, the photographer, with her multi-layered identities and representations of women in all sorts of fascinating social classes and situations. And her sense of self, I suppose, as she views herself constantly morphing and putting herself in the past, present and future. Nina Simone I'm very influenced by, in terms of voice. The absolute desperation and passion and commitment in her voice. And the way that she performed is very inspirational to me, just without boundaries. Sarah Bernhardt, who I think actually performed in the Cutler Majestic; that's very exciting. I think she was preparing for a film when she died. Even with the amputated leg, she kept going. I really love that sort of relentless obsession with some sort of spiritual connection with the audience.

DO YOU FEEL THAT WAY, THAT PERFORMING IS SOMETHING YOU'RE COMPELLED TO DO? I do. I feel like performing is breathing. We've all had difficult times in our lives and I feel very grateful that music and performance is such a large part of my life because it's sort of given me a personal cathartic outlet. But also, the physical aspect of getting onstage and breathing—singing makes you breathe—I'm sort of addressing that in this show. I feel lucky that with music we have something that really connects us very quickly with the heart and the soul. I think particularly in this show, it's about how I must dance till I die, because the alternative is frightening.

IF YOU COULDN'T PERFORM, WHAT DO YOU THINK YOU WOULD DO INSTEAD? I think I'd probably be a photographer. I don't know; music is so important that I can't imagine my life without it. I do like writing. I write a lot of songs and verses, but if we were to take out music, I just think I'd die. But I think as an artist you're sort of engaging with people all the time, and observing them and putting them into your work, so I think that photography is still doing that.

WHAT'S A SONG THAT REALLY HAD AN EFFECT ON YOUR RELATIONSHIP WITH MUSIC? Oh, there's so many. I've just been in Slovenia with the orchestra over there, and in that program, Richard Tognetti, who's one of the most exquisite violinists in the world, was conducting Mahler's Fifth [Symphony] from Death in Venice. I first heard that when I was a little girl, and it was interesting just standing in the wings before I went on. I felt so connected to history and beauty

INGREDIENTS: Espolón blanco tequila, lemongrass, lemon juice, habanero shrub

TASTE: This take on a margarita is citrusy with an undertone of sweetness and ends with a kick.

BACKSTORY: "We had a tricky decision to make in terms of where we wanted to focus our efforts," says beverage director Yuri Bredbeck of JP tapas bar/bookstore/record shop Tres Gatos, which picked up a full liquor license at the beginning of the year. The bar staff has since played around with peanut-infused bourbon, and they're currently working on a squash-infused rum. But ultimately, they decided to hone in on tequila and mezcal. "I took it as a personal challenge to focus on something that wasn't going to easily sell itself and to offer things that people can't find all over the place."

NEXT ROUND: The John Cage ($11), which features Del Maguey Vida mezcal, Aperol and Carpano Antica. "It's not necessarily everyone's favorite liquor," Bredbeck admits of mezcal. While Scotch drinkers tend to appreciate its smokiness, he notes, "A lot of people just think of it as smoke in a glass." But Bredbeck is attracted to the liquor's less-noticed floral and botanical notes, and he says the John Cage should appeal to Negroni drinkers.

FALL FORECAST: Expect new menu additions that may feature apple, plum and tamarind flavors, with a chance of a strawberry balsamic shrub. / Sarah Hagman

An Open Cookbook

Cookbooks are made up of more than instructions and ingredient lists—the author's memories often end up in the mix. We asked the local culinarians behind three new releases to dish on their most personal recipes. / Jacqueline Houton

"The recipe in the book that is most personal to me is the chicken stew with cornmeal dumplings," says Top Chef alum and Liquid Art House chef de cuisine Stacy Cogswell, who debuts The New New England Cookbook on Oct. 13. "My grandmother used to make me chicken stew with buttermilk dumplings in the fall and winter. I can remember the smell of her kitchen as it cooked and the anticipation that I had as a child to eat it. It was one of those moments in life when you realize what you want to do and anything else won't make you happy. I wanted to cook."

"This recipe from the 1930s [for Grandma Goldberg's Honey Cake] comes from Hilary Finkel Buxton, a friend from our days at WGBH, and her sister, Sandy Hyman-Mahaffey," say Cambridge duo Marilynn and Sheila Brass, who boast 128 years of kitchen experience between them and release Baking with the Brass Sisters on Oct. 6. "We spent an afternoon emailing back and forth, all three of us talking about Grandma Goldberg and making attempts to decipher her handwritten recipe. Eventually, our home kitchen was filled with the aroma of Grandma's wonderful golden Honey Cake."

"Rompopo, a Latin-style eggnog filled with plenty of rum, cinnamon and vanilla, is so much a part of my family's history that it's more like a fifth food group at every special event during colder months," says Eat Boutique founder Maggie Battista, whose book Food Gift Love—featuring recipes for edible gifts, complete with wrapping how-tos—hits shelves Oct. 13. "The recipe found our family through my mother. She was born in Honduras but settled in the U.S. in the 1960s, with dreams of being a singer. She still makes her own private stash of rompopo today, adding a little extra rum, humming as she stirs and sips."

"Jellyfish are primarily water and collagen," says the Café ArtScience pastry chef, who's whipping up some unconventional confections for The Trouble with Jellyfish, a newly opened exhibit at the adjoining Le Laboratoire Cambridge. The idea came out of Laboratoire founder and Harvard professor David Edwards' class How to Create Things and Have Them Matter, where students investigated jellies' potential as a food additive. "The students actually found that jellyfish might replace egg and that the collagen provides interesting food texture," notes Connolly, who used a pint of processed jellies to create 300 cinnamon-honey financier mini-cakes for the opening. DEAR SURLY SHOPPERS: I went out to do a few errands with my wife today, and I must say, I think everybody hates everybody! A big guy at the liquor store almost ran over me three times, the clerk in the bottle return area couldn't have been more rude, and at the farm stand, the ladies were just as rude as could be. Is this what the USA is coming to? This is not the way I was brought up...

DEAR JUDGY "POLITE PEDESTRIAN": There is a big difference between being a "polite pedestrian" and planning and executing someone's travel itinerary. In this case, directing the foreign couple on the Orange Line needing to get to the Banana Republic on Derby Street in Hingham is a logistical nightmare both in terms of time and resources for the average commuter. If you have a superiority complex, maybe rightly deserved, please do not judge other commuters who instead used this time to destress and catch up with their busy lives. My wife makes jewelry, so these are two of her beaded necklaces. ... They're two of my favorite pieces, so I always wear them.

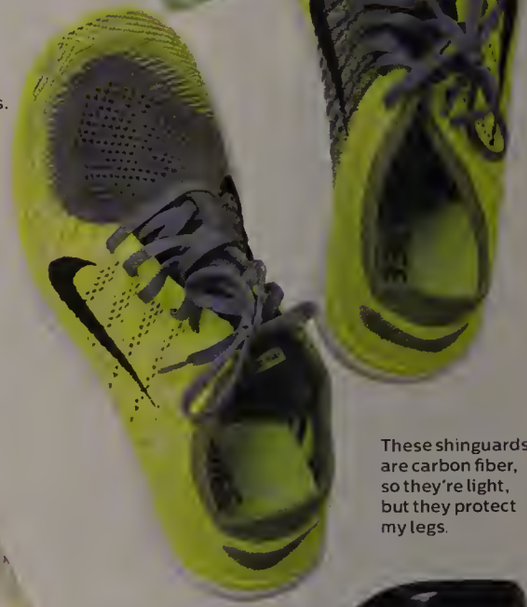
I do Bible study with a couple of the guys on the team [Teal Bunbury and Andrew Farrell], and this is the book we're working on. ... We go through a chapter or two each week, and then we talk about different topics.



I use this to roll out because I have some tight muscles.

THE BARD AT THE BAR

TWO LOCAL SHAKESPEARE PROFESSORS PLAY MIXOLOGIST, WITH INTOXICATING RESULTS.

Shakespeare, Not Stirred* by Caroline Bicks and Michelle Ephraim Published by Perigee. 176 pages. $17

FUNNY AS SHAKESPEARE WAS, HE couldn't have predicted the wild, pun-crazy irreverence these local English professors have cooked up. Using dishy talk the Bard didn't live to know, they present sardonic vignettes of various characters and their dramatic dilemmas, followed by a drink recipe. For instance, a chapter entitled "Shall I Campari to a Summer's Day?" features recipes for romantic occasions, including the boozy smoothie "Rosalind's Gender Blender."

With a refreshing modern perspective, these rapscallion professors feign talking to Shakespeare's characters, sometimes like fed-up schoolteachers, sometimes like cynical college kids. Really, they wonder, shouldn't Hamlet have gone into therapy? They consider Antony's main squeeze: "Call Cleopatra what you will—floozy, home wrecker, destroyer of the Roman Triumvirate (blah, blah, blah, she's heard it all.)" Richard III's self-pity gets their mockery: "Face it, Dick, you're a middle child with shoe lifts." Their take on the power-grabbing king is, naturally, followed by a recipe for "Richard's Gimme-Let."

Those mischievously described drinks, along with some snacks (like "Oberon's Spicy Fairy Wings"), are great. So too are the "Mini-Bard" plot and theme summaries, which are more academic but as perfectly portioned as a carefully poured shot, so you can actually learn some Shakespeare between sips.

FROM PAGE 59: Macbeth loses his job and his head faster than you can say "Highlander," so it's easy to forget that when Macbeth begins, he's the Big Man on the Battlefield. Even before he sets foot onstage, his army comrades are raving about how he sliced open a Scottish traitor "from the nave to th' chops." His sword was so full of man-heat that it "smoked with bloody execution"! ◆

Traveler's Checks

Meliá Paris La Défense is located near the stark concrete Grande Arche, opened in '89 after a design contest that aimed to create a contemporary bookend to the Arc de Triomphe at the other end of the Champs-Élysées.

Besides Le Miroir, most of the good food is to be found beyond La Défense. But wine? You're covered with Apogé, a wine shop/bar with an ample terrace, where you can sample any of the 200-plus varietals before buying.

BUSINESS AND PLEASURE: Meliá Paris La Défense has panoramic views and decor by designer Jean-Philippe Nuel.

PARIS ON THE CLOCK

THE BUSINESS DISTRICT IS A SMART STARTING POINT FOR EXPLORING THE CITY OF LIGHT.

Ah, Paris. Sweet Paris. It's the city of love, where young amorous hearts light up like the glittering Eiffel—blah, blah, blah. Move it along, will you? I've got a meeting in 10.

Look, Paris may have a reputation as the romance capital of Europe, but it's also a major business hub—which means many Bostonians hopping daily direct flights from Logan are heading there for work, not wooing. That raises the question: How can time-pressed professionals make the most of a brief stay? The short answer: Secure a smart room, then make executive decisions about skipping certain tourist standbys in favor of more thoughtful, equally engaging picks. Allow us to explain, sans PowerPoint.

First, choose your home base. Work will probably take you to La Défense, the major business district just outside Paris proper. Like Boston's Financial District, it's a worker beehive that stops buzzing after 5 pm and on weekends (though events like food truck fests are starting to bring more energy to the area after office hours). Here's where you'll find the marvelous Meliá Paris La Défense, the largest four-star hotel to open in the city in the past decade. Looking like a glistening glass boat hull, it houses 369 hotel rooms as modern and spiffy as a Hugo Boss suit: Think charcoal and cream fabrics with orange accents—plus panoramic views over Paris. (Find them at the DJ-fueled Skyline Paris Lounge & Bar too.) You'll start each morning with a workout at the 19th-floor fitness center overlooking the city, then graze on parfaits, charcuterie and other fancy French breakfast fare at the Level Lounge, reserved for guests who splurge on premium service. (Do it. It's going on the company card.) By night, indulge at Le Miroir, the hotel's restaurant—one of the best in the 'hood—serving modern Mediterranean cuisine in a trendy room with a wide wall of windows for unparalleled people watching on the esplanade.

Oh, about that. The Meliá is located basically atop the Esplanade de la Défense subway stop, so you're under 10 minutes (Metro time, not MBTA time) from the touristy stuff, but at a brand-new hotel with better rates than comparable downtown options. Here are a few tips for making the most of your sightseeing time.

Everyone loves: Ascending the Eiffel Tower to see Paris from its highest point. (And snap kissy-face selfies, of course.) Smarter move: We're not going to sniff at the appeal of such a landmark—but one of Paris's lowest points will make for a more interesting status update. The Catacombs of Paris, dubbed the "world's largest grave," is a fascinating underground museum-maze whose labyrinthine corridors contain the bones of six million Parisians. There's even a wall where some devoted couples sign their names. Till death do they part.

Everyone loves: Humming their favorite song from Disney's Hunchback while visiting the Cathédrale Notre Dame. The Gothic wonder is certainly impressive—especially if you plod up the 387 steps of the tower tour, which offers amazing Seine views and a front-row audience with stone gargoyles. Smarter move: Notre Dame's fame dwarfs that of the nearby chapel Sainte-Chapelle, but the smaller structure holds an awe-inspiring surprise on its second floor, where radiant stained glass scenes rise 50 feet high across four ribbed walls, casting brilliant and beautiful colored light. It's a religious experience, and it'll take way less time than fighting the larger crowds at Notre Dame—so you can still make time to hit Sacré-Coeur, a hilltop basilica that is the second highest point in Paris. After taking in the view, explore the charming shops and cafes below in the cobblestone-lined Montmartre neighborhood, still the beating heart of Paris's bohemian arts scene.

Everyone loves: Crowding around the Mona Lisa at the Louvre or the impressionist masterworks at the Musée d'Orsay, some of the greatest art the world has ever seen. We get it, we get it. Smarter move: Yeah, everyone should go once. But at some of these institutions you'll spend more time staring at the back of someone's head than at the works on the wall. Throngs seem thinner at contemporary art destinations, even the well-known Centre Pompidou, a tube-covered creation from Renzo Piano (the Italian architect behind the new Gardner wing and the revamped Harvard Art Museums), which looks like a hamster Habitrail but is actually Europe's largest modern art museum. And still being discovered is Fondation Louis Vuitton, a $143 million contemporary art museum holding works from artists from Basquiat to Warhol, which the famous French fashion house opened in October 2014. Its Frank Gehry-designed building, which resembles a boat unfurling glass sails, is architectural art too. ◆

TREE OF LIFE

BANYAN OFFERS A PRICEY, GLAM TAKE ON EAST/WEST FUSION.

BANYAN BAR + REFUGE
553 Tremont St., Boston (617-556-4211)
banyanboston.com

The South End's new Banyan Bar + Refuge has great bones. It's run by Rebecca Roth Gullo and Seth Yaffe of the nearby Gallows and Blackbird Doughnuts, 5-year-old and 9-month-old smashes, respectively. Chef Phillip Tang hails from East by Northeast, a beloved, bygone Inman Square Asian joint. Their redo of the revered Hamersley's Bistro space is breathtaking: The spacious patio oasis remains, the bar has been expanded into a hopping grazing spot, and the dining room is now an airy cathedral festooned with nests of bare branches. It's like stumbling on a sunlit glade in a grove of stately white birches in winter. The hallowed ghost of Gordon's roast chicken might gasp in admiration.

Tang's open kitchen turns out an ambitious menu that alternates between glorified reworkings of casual Asian dishes and the voguish, umami-heavy East/West fusion of David Chang's Momofuku empire. The results are frequently sensational. Takoyaki ($11), a gloss on Japanese street-food octopus fritters, is superb: airy fried-dough spheres with bits of braised squid in a sweet soy glaze and drizzles of aioli dusted with waving flakes of bonito. Fried pig tails ($8), slices in garlic/black-bean sauce with gremolata, are a crispy, fatty, bony pleasure—the gourmand's Saugus Wings. Grilled corn ($8) is risky in Toro's 'hood, but Tang sweetly reinvents it, subbing togarashi for espelette, whipped coconut for aioli and toasted coconut for cotija. Lacinato kale salad ($10) is a generous, amply dressed bowl of greens brilliantly punched up with fried shallots. Octopus ($16) is finely chopped, piquantly dressed with grapefruit, sweet chili sauce and peanuts, and served on lettuce wraps: complex, delightful, drippy. Similarly messy but impeccable are grilled head-on shrimp ($16), plump behemoths that don't need the Thai-inflected yellow curry sauce.

Not every dish is flawless in concept or execution. House pork wontons ($12) show skill in their handcrafted boiled dumplings, but their delicacy is pummeled by a heavy sauce of smoked tahini. Cast-iron duck-confit crispy rice ($25) is a homely, overpriced fiasco: uncrisp rice bedecked with limp duck, pale corn relish and a poached egg, white-on-white on a white plate, the bland squiggle of gochujang ketchup no help. Crudos offer a very pricey few bites, their delicate foundations overwhelmed by adornments. The flavor of smoked scallops ($15) barely ekes through layers of corn puree, pickled celery and potato sticks; fluke ($14) is undetectable under soy-ginger vinaigrette, chili oil, orange segments and crushed cashews.

Tang makes great Chinese breads for wrapping around sweet/savory/spicy fillings. His fantastic lobster roll ($15) fills a chewy, English-muffin-like bun with lots of warm lobster dressed with honey miso butter: the Connecticut shore by way of Shaanxi, with a side of pickled sea beans for briny contrast. A fried oyster bun ($11) fills mantou (think puffy, steamed wheat tortilla) with savory soy cucumbers, arugula and garlic/black-bean aioli, but brutally overfries its oyster to a dry brown lump. Red-braised pulled pork ($8) on mantou fares better with tender pork, crunchy slaw and fried shallots, though the whole is more evocative of Charlotte than Jiangsu.

Larger dishes are simpler and more consistent. Fried chicken ($27) punches up an able fry job with acidic chimichurri and funky furikake, plus good Kewpie-mayo potato salad, again recalling the American South more than Southern China. Whole fried fish (scup on one night, $32) is barely seasoned with spicy lime sauce, a faint accent of Sichuan-peppercorn salt and mild ginger/scallion relish, but flawless cooking of a meaty specimen with some crisp skin is its own perfect pleasure. The sole dessert, cream puffs ($10) glazed with miso caramel and flecked with sesame seeds, offers a sweet parting nod to East/West fusion.

The busy bar serves a few Tiki-inspired drinks, like the on-tap Painkiller ($12) of spiced rum and pineapple and orange juices topped with coconut foam—kicky and fun. Cocktails often feature house-infused spirits, like plum-infused rye in the Umeboshi Old Fashioned ($12); most skew sweet by 21st-century standards. The bartenders, while amiable and hustling, don't boast the craft scholarship that most new indies hire away from Garrett Harker or Barbara Lynch. Three jars of sake ($12-$15), a dozen wines by the glass ($9-$12) and a compact, mostly-Asian roster of beer ($5-$12) offer nice-priced, better-suited accompaniment. You'll have to dig deep for a bottle of wine: The list of 14 runs $55-$180, with most choices under $75. Table service mostly lives up to the prices, with a few rough-edged exceptions.

Banyan appears to be triangulating carefully, competing not only for sophisticated city dwellers but tourists and suburbanites. Its mild take on East/West fusion seems aimed at diners who find Shojo and Ribelle too weird, its cocktails a comfort to drinkers weary of complex craft concoctions. The gorgeous room and pretty small plates seem tailored for special occasions and deal-closing date nights. But longevity in a space this big hinges on neighborhood loyalty, and South Enders are a demanding bunch. To win that crowd at these prices, Banyan's talented team is going to have to execute with a little more consistency. ◆

ASK CHERYL

Q: I HAVE A REALLY THIN FACE, AND I AM A RUNNER. MY FRIENDS TELL ME MY FACE LOOKS GAUNT, AND I'M GETTING CREASES IN MY FACE. SUGGESTIONS?

A: Men and women with thin faces usually do not have much fat in their face, which can cause a skeletal appearance. There can be hollows under the eyes, creases from the nose to the mouth, and sunken cheeks.

These conditions can be corrected through the injection of a class of products known as "fillers".

As the name implies, fillers are used to fill in any hollows or deformities in our faces to return them to a normal-looking state. Most fillers are a transparent gel that is made from hyaluronic acid; a substance that is produced naturally by our bodies. Brand names include Juvederm and Restylane.

Fillers are injected directly into facial lines in the mid and lower face to plump up the face or to "fill in" wrinkles by replacing volume. Common areas to use filler include tear troughs under the eyes, cheeks, facial creases or wrinkles and lips.

The results are immediate: an improved appearance with no downtime and the results can be expected to last 6 to 18 months!

THE MARTIAN ★★★★
Starring Matt Damon, Jessica Chastain, Michael Peña, Kate Mara, Sebastian Stan, Aksel Hennie, Sean Bean, Kristen Wiig, Donald Glover, Mackenzie Davis, Chiwetel Ejiofor, Benedict Wong and Jeff Daniels. Written by Drew Goddard, based on the novel by Andy Weir. Directed by Ridley Scott. At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

FOUND IN SPACE

MATT DAMON ANCHORS RIDLEY SCOTT'S MASTERFUL ODE TO HUMAN INGENUITY.

RAISE YOUR HAND IF YOU'VE HEARD this one before: Matt Damon plays an astronaut who's stranded alone on an inhospitable planet, and he's willing to do just about anything to beat the odds and get back home to Earth.

OK, put your hand down, because The Martian isn't Interstellar. It's better than that. In Christopher Nolan's picture, Damon portrayed a murderous character who embodied man's worst instincts, heavy-handedly named "Mann." Now, in Ridley Scott's triumphant and realistically science-minded ode to the human spirit, the charming actor plays the much more normal-sounding (and normal-acting) Mark Watney, the lowest-ranking member of a six-person expedition to Mars.

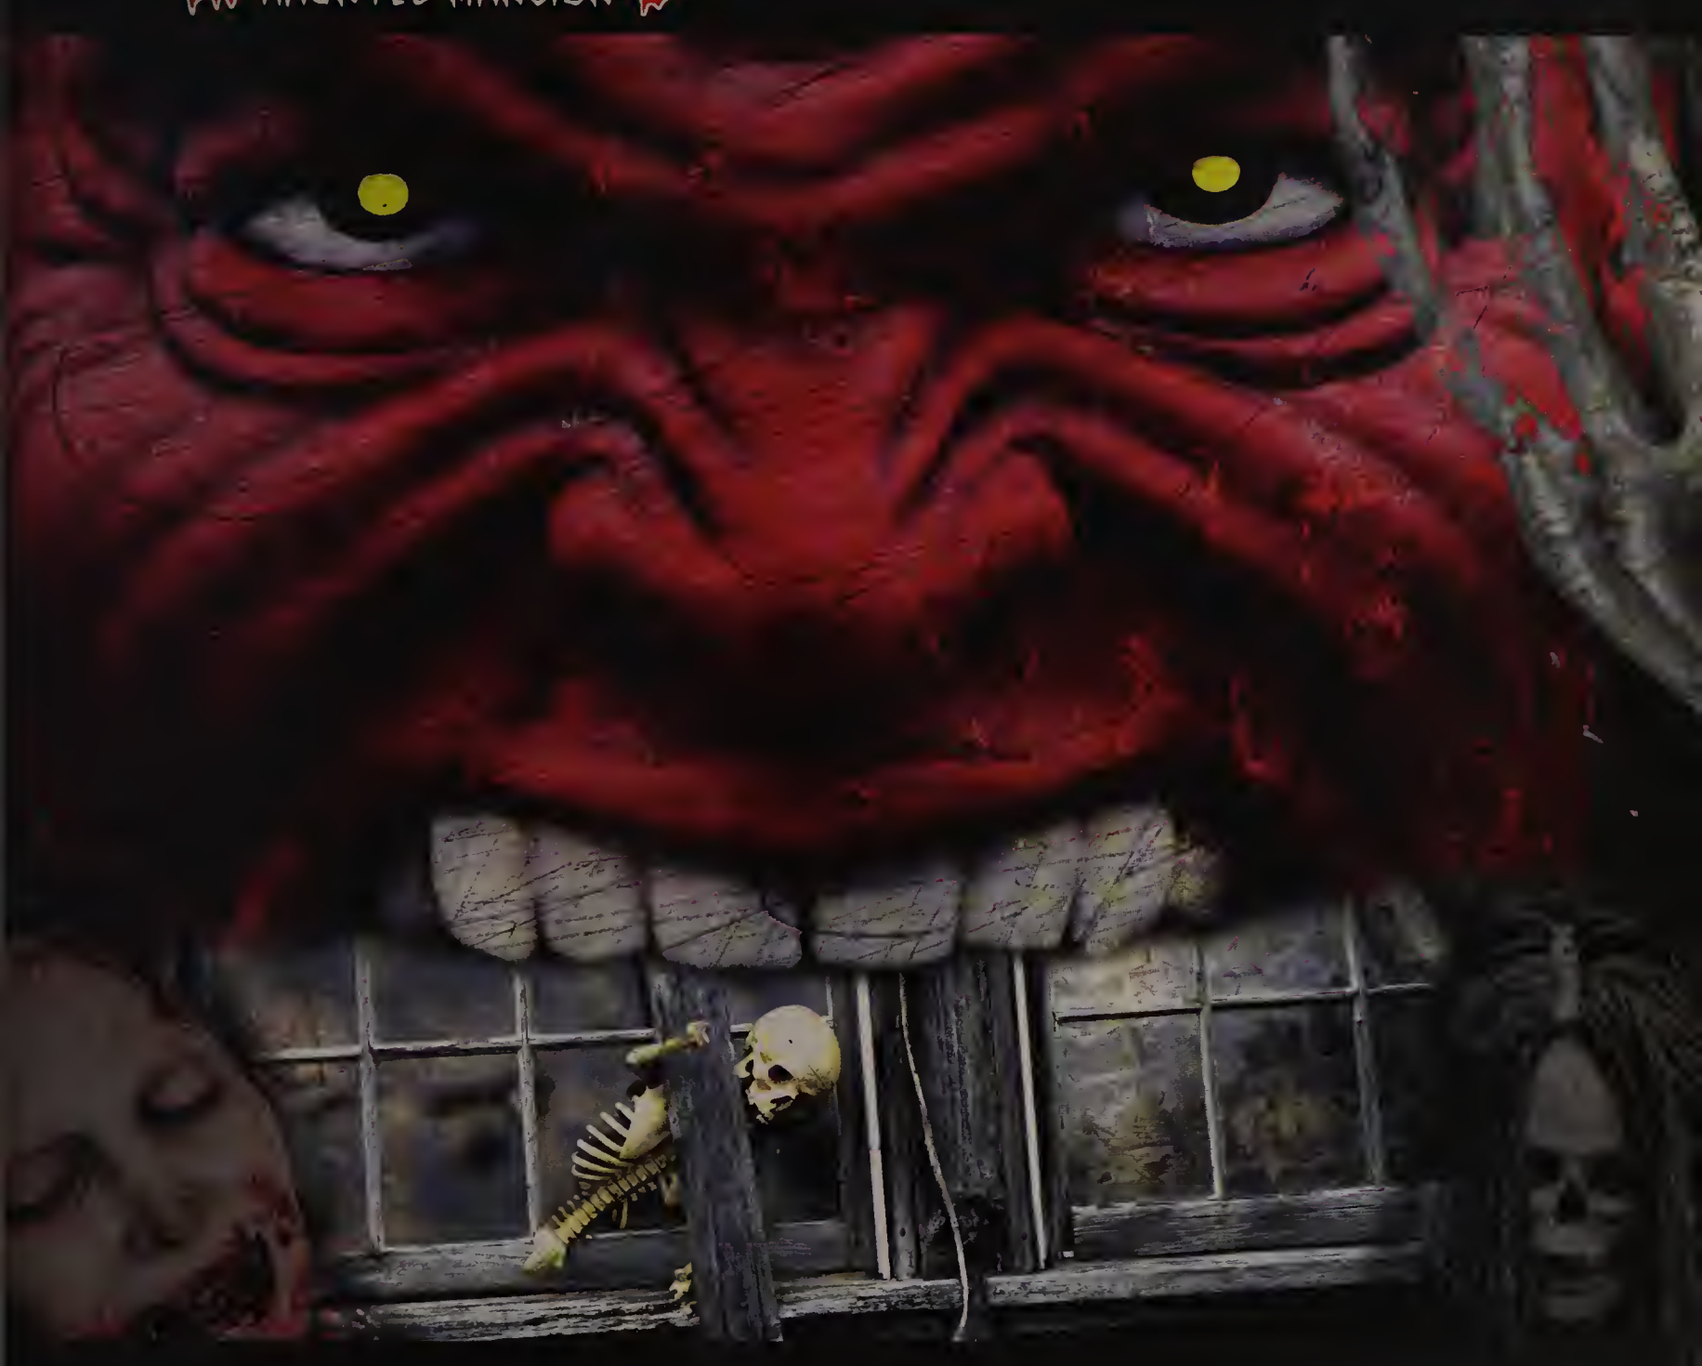
The film opens with a scene that quickly and vividly enacts the setup that's only alluded to in Andy Weir's speculative-fiction novel, a humorous page-turner that's been splendidly adapted for the screen by Drew Goddard, cowriter and director of 2012's rather smart, funny horror hybrid The Cabin in the Woods. Goddard's humor remains intact in this script—which isn't to say there's not also a touch of horror.

Back to that opening scene: The six-person crew of the Ares 3, the third manned mission to the Red Planet, is only a few days into their two-month stay when a massive sandstorm kicks up. Cmdr. Melissa Lewis (Jessica Chastain, another holdover from Interstellar), fearing that their Mars Descent Vehicle could be in danger, orders her disappointed crew to abort their mission and return to the safety of the Hermes, the space-faring vessel that transported them from Earth to Mars. As the six don their environmental suits, making the short trek from the habitat to the MDV for evacuation, Mark is struck by debris and hurled through the low-visibility air. He's been impaled in the abdomen by an antenna, which has also destroyed his suit's biomonitor, causing the rest of his crewmates—

Damon delivers the lines with a can-do attitude and a twinkle in his eye, and we believe in him.

Rick Martinez (Michael Peña), Beth Johanssen (Kate Mara), Chris Beck (Sebastian Stan) and Alex Vogel (Aksel Hennie)—to presume he's dead. As the MDV rockets them back to the orbiting Hermes, Scott and ace cinematographer Dariusz Wolski focus their 3-D cameras on Mark's empty chair in the cabin.

Unbeknownst to the grief-stricken crew and those back at NASA's Johnson Space Center in Houston—mission director Venkat Kapoor (Chiwetel Ejiofor), Annie Montrose (Kristen Wiig), Mindy Park (Mackenzie Davis), Mitch Henderson (Sean Bean, who keeps his composure during a very funny Lord of the Rings gag) and head honcho Teddy Sanders (Jeff Daniels in no-nonsense Newsroom mode)—Mark is still alive...and a bit of a MacGyver. Right off the bat, he demonstrates his resourcefulness under pressure, treating and suturing his life-threatening puncture wound.



Mark determines that it will take four years for a rescue mission to reach him—after they realize he's still alive. And even if he rations it, the food supply will only last a year. "Luckily, I'm a botanist," Mark says during one of his many video log entries, a device that nicely nods to the journal entries of Robinson Crusoe and allows him to effectively address the audience directly through much of the film. "Mars will come to fear my botany powers," Mark tells us. Damon delivers the lines with a can-do attitude and a twinkle in his eye, and we believe in him as he concludes, "I'm gonna have to science the shit out of this." Which he does, burning hydrazine fuel to create water and using his own waste as mulch for potato farming.

Meanwhile, back on Earth, NASA notices activity at the habitat, and soon the efforts to keep Mark alive are being coordinated on the homefront, too. Not that there aren't setbacks. Nearly anything that can go wrong does, but rather than play things for suspense, as Alfonso Cuarón did in 2013's Oscar-winning Gravity, Scott presents his picture as a paean to the enduring spirit of man's ingenuity against overwhelming odds.

The 77-year-old director, who already has two science-fiction classics on his resume (1979's Alien and 1982's Blade Runner), makes it all look easy, and he's aided by almost all of the same crew from his last sci-fi film (2012's Alien prequel, Prometheus), who improve upon much of what they learned on that compulsively watchable mess here. There is one notable addition: Harry Gregson-Williams, who does commendable work on the film's score. Rather than composing suspenseful musical cues, he underlines the ingenuity on display from all quarters with a documentary-style approach.

Still, as terrific as his music is, it's Scott's perfect choice of pop song for the closing credits that will leave you smiling as you exit the theater: Gloria Gaynor's "I Will Survive." ◆

DIVINE PROVIDENCE

TWO OFFBEAT BANDS OVERLAP IN FORGING A CHEEKY NEW POP ENTITY.

COINCIDENCE AND MUTUAL APPRECIATION led to the band FFS, the surprising union of Scottish dance-rockers Franz Ferdinand and the eccentric LA duo Sparks. In a way, the first seed was planted back in the mid-'90s, when future Franz Ferdinand frontman Alex Kapranos was foraging for used records.

"I'd go down to this big flea market that we'd have in Glasgow and buy a stack of records that I didn't know anything about," says Kapranos, 43. One was "Amateur Hour," the 1974 single by Sparks brothers Russell and Ron Mael. "It didn't sound like anything I'd heard before, Russell's falsetto vocal soaring above this staccato piano that was insistent, and the lyric was unconventional. It made me laugh."

A decade later, Franz Ferdinand was riding high on their 2004 debut single "Take Me Out." The Mael brothers heard the song and noticed a magazine story where Kapranos cited Sparks among his favorite bands. They met for coffee and spoke of working together. But Franz Ferdinand was busy, and nothing came of it for another decade—until Kapranos broke a tooth and was walking down the street in San Francisco, looking for Huey Lewis' dentist. "I heard this voice: 'Alex, is that you?' And I turned around, and it was Ron and Russell."

This time, they didn't let serendipity pass them by. The Mael brothers presented Franz Ferdinand with a draft of the tongue-in-cheek "Collaborations Don't Work," and soon both bands were trading lyrics over the Internet, sealing that song with zingers like "I don't need your navel gazing / I don't get your way of phrasing."

"We share a certain sense of humor, and that definitely made the process easier," Kapranos says from London. "Songs went back and forth very quickly, and before we knew it, we had a whole album's worth." FFS released their self-titled album in June and launched an extensive tour that hits the Orpheum Theatre on Oct. 2.

"It's more from the American perspective that people think more that [the music] is oddball or that sort of thing, because in Europe, it's really more openly embraced."

"It's been a completely amazing experience," Sparks singer Russell Mael, 66, adds from LA. "Both sides push each other."

The resulting songs represent a smart hybrid of each band's sound, even if Sparks' imprint stands out more for its idiosyncratic sensibilities. For more than 40 years, the Mael brothers have juggled bandmates and styles, grandly fusing multi-tracked bits of synth-pop, cabaret, disco, opera and musical theater. "We thought that a band should have all those elements covered," he says, citing musically and lyrically provocative British bands with "a strong visual image" like the Who and the Kinks. In the U.S., people didn't notice much beyond his brother Ron's Hitler-like mustache, and the Maels decamped for a time to London. "It's more from the American perspective that people think more that [the music] is oddball or that sort of thing, because in Europe, it's really more openly embraced," he says. "Things are still as conservative as ever in the States."

Which perhaps makes a song like FFS' "Piss Off" more delightfully apt, with lines like "Most will listen and take the hint / Know that this ain't a compliment." That attitude is doubled with Kapranos and Mael sharing dual vocal leads, tradeoffs and harmonies, honed in rehearsals before hitting the studio with producer John Congleton (St. Vincent, Swans).

"The other roles within FFS don't overlap," says Mael, whose keyboardist brother Ron supplements Franz Ferdinand guitarist Nick McCarthy, bassist Bob Hardy and drummer Paul Thomson. "We wanted to find a way to integrate the two vocals into just about every song, so it could make seamless transitions."

The tandem proves entertaining at live shows, with Kapranos largely ditching his guitar to go toe-to-toe with Mael. FFS also plays a few Franz Ferdinand and Sparks songs to satisfy their respective audiences.

As to whether FFS represents a lucky one-off or a new course for their separate bands, neither singer will predict. "Neither camp really knows what the future will hold for FFS," Mael says, while Kapranos offers, "I didn't know whether it would be an album, and I certainly didn't think we'd end up touring it.... That's one of my favorite feelings in the world, not knowing what's going to happen next." ◆

GET A ROOM

HOW I PAID THE PRICE FOR AN AIRBNB STAY.

I WON'T TELL YOU THE NAME OF THE DUDE, or of the organization that was having the meeting, because I don't want the world's worst Airbnb host Googling himself and finding out that I wrote something, thus compelling him to emerge from his nicely appointed New York apartment and come looking for me. I am a conflict-avoider. But sometimes conflict barges in uninvited. Sometimes you find it on Airbnb. Or, as I now call it, ScarebnFlee.

Here's the scene: A business meeting in New York, out of the office. Someone booked a nice Airbnb apartment with an outdoor patio. I was in town for this meeting, so hey, I could sleep there too and avoid expensing a hotel room. I was a little apprehensive because I'd never used Airbnb, but I've read the stories about horrified owners returning to find Fatty Orgy Cake Smush '15 in full swing. It seems like there's less risk on the renter side. User reviews are there to ensure that civility and decorum are maintained through righteous transparency. Such is the way of the sharing economy.

It all started off fine. I buzzed the apartment, and after a moment a guy appeared at the door and let me in—the owner. "Your group is upstairs, to the right," he said brightly, and I thanked him and went in. I kind of wondered where he'd go for the night. Maybe he crashes on a friend's couch and gives him a cut on nights when there's some Airbnb action. In any case, not my problem—or was it? (This, aspiring writers, is what's known as "foreshadowing the return of the psycho Airbnb guy.")

We'd all planned to be there pretty late. Dinner and drinks are conducive to brainstorming. But at some point, the owner texted an unexpected commandment: Remember to be out by 9 pm. This occasioned a little back and forth, as the contract said we had the place till the morning. At which point he said he'd be back very soon to throw us all out. This was about two hours after he graciously let me in.

True to his word, he burst in and started yelling "Everyone get out of my house!" Now, there were a dozen of us, mostly guys, some of them big. But that didn't prevent our Tasmanian devil from straight-up grabbing people like he intended to Road House us out the door one-by-one. Right away, the devil grabbed one of my coworkers by the throat and began shoving him off the patio, toward the front door. My latent meathead tendencies activated, and I wrapped up the aggressor and pulled him off. He was stronger than he looked. Does krokodil give you the strength of a dozen men? After the throat-grabbing, someone called 911, which is a good indication that you're heading for a less-than-five-star Airbnb review. "Great location, nice kitchen layout, owner assaulted everyone and we called 911."

Right around this point I got the feeling that he might throw one of us down the stairs. Maybe it was my keen intuition, or maybe it was the fact that he said, "I will literally throw you down the stairs." I'm quite sure those were his exact words, because after the initial chokehold I started surreptitiously shooting video with my phone. It's not the greatest footage, because I didn't want Mr. Bates Motel to realize he was being taped for potential evidence. In fact, I didn't want him to notice me at all. When in the presence of crazy people, it is my policy to refrain from engagement. Pull him off your coworker: Yes. Attempt to discuss Airbnb cancelation and refund polices: No. Maintain an awareness of the proximity of the kitchen knives: Yes!

Concluding that I would not be sticking it out for the night at this particular pad, I took my suitcase downstairs and awaited the cops. Four NYPD officers arrived, and I debriefed them on the handsy fellow waiting upstairs. "Looks like he got you there," said one of the cops, gesturing to a tiny scrape on my thumb, a bloodied cuticle. So he did. But I'm no hero. I mean, you can call me that. I won't correct you. But I'm not like "Status update: feeling super brave." That doesn't exist. I looked.

I hoped they'd perp walk him back down in cuffs and I'd tell him that I peed on his toilet seat (even though I certainly didn't because that would be rude), but the cops returned empty-handed. "Well," one of them said, "you can't cure crazy." A second cop added, "I don't know if I'd rent that Airbnb again." They didn't want anything more to do with this guy than we did.

And we left it at that. We all went out to dinner, and I booked a hotel room. One question remained unanswered: Who showed up at 9 o'clock? I don't know, but I'm betting they brought cake. ◆

WHAT'S COOKING?

THE FAMED CHEF DISHES ON EXOTIC EATS, COOKBOOK OVERLOAD AND TV SECRETS.

JAMES BEARD AWARD-WINNING COOKBOOK AUTHOR, teacher, chef, restaurateur and television personality Joanne Weir is a fourth-generation culinary pro. Her great-grandmother operated the legendary Boston restaurant Pilgrim's Pantry, her grandfather was an Army chef, and her mother was a caterer. After earning a degree in art education from the University of Massachusetts and teaching fine arts in Boston, she returned to the kitchen, cooking with Alice Waters at Chez Panisse in Berkeley, California, and studying with Madeleine Kamman in France, where she was awarded a Master Chef Diploma with honors. Her newest PBS series, Joanne Weir Gets Fresh, began airing in January, and her latest cookbook, Kitchen Gypsy, was released in September, when she returned to Boston to cook at the UMass Club. She lives in San Francisco.

JONATHAN SOROFF: Is food love?
JOANNE WEIR: Absolutely. No two ways about it.

Favorite thing in the world to cook? Pizza. But the weird thing is that I've eaten so much of it that I've become gluten sensitive. I used to say that it would be my last meal on earth, and now it probably will be.

Least favorite thing to cook? Calf's liver.

Three things I'll always find in your fridge? Definitely a lot of wine. Mustard. I love mustard. And a billion vegetables.

If you don't enjoy cooking, do you think the food will taste bad? If you don't enjoy cooking, I don't think you can season things well. But I think you can learn it.

So anyone can learn to cook? I think so, but it certainly helps to have a little bit of a passion for it.

Person you'd most like to cook for? My father. He passed away several years ago. Kitchen Gypsy is named that because my father always called me his wandering gypsy.

Guilty pleasure? Oh, God! Potato chips. It's killer. If they're in my kitchen, they just whisper my name. I can't buy them.

Secret to great Mexican food? Knowing your chiles.

Cilantro—yay or nay? I love it. Thank God, since I own a Mexican restaurant.

Cuisine you've never attempted? Asian, and I probably never will. It's just not my thing. I love Mediterranean food. That's number one. I love eating Asian food, but I'm not going to cook it.

Cooking and baking—two totally different things? Yes. Cooking, you don't need a recipe or to do things precisely. Baking, you do.

Grossest thing you ever ate? I love everything I put in my mouth. I'm obsessed with food.

Most exotic thing you ever ate? Probably duck tongues, in Australia. There was a whole platter of duck tongues. Imagine how many ducks they had to slaughter.

Favorite kitchen gadget? A good knife. For me, that's the most important tool in the kitchen.

True or false: The food on TV cooking programs is misleading because there's a crew of people making the same thing and you pick the one that looks the best. That's a great question, but on my show, I have a crew of three. But they do more prep, not finished dishes. I really try to cook in real time.

Thoughts on the cooking reality shows? If they taught us something, I think it'd be great, but I really don't love the competitions. I have a hard time figuring out what to make for dinner, let alone trying to figure out what to do with asparagus and octopus or a Twinkie. It's just not my thing.

Favorite celebrity chef? [Yotam] Ottolenghi. I think he's great.

Is the way to a man's heart through his stomach? Yes. Especially if he likes food. If he's just a meat-and-potatoes guy, it might not matter.

One essential to good cooking? Having passion for it, and having a good palate. And not being afraid of salt.

"I have a hard time figuring out what to make for dinner, let alone trying to figure out what to do with asparagus and octopus or a Twinkie."

Silver bullet in the kitchen? Well, every dish calls for something different, but I really like acidity, so I'd say a white balsamic vinegar. I really like acidity and salt. Those two things really do it for me. It can also be lemon juice, lime juice or something, but that bite is key.

Do people unfairly characterize British food as bad? Yes, but I think that happens with a lot of different cuisines around the world.

Thoughts on molecular gastronomy? Not my thing. I just don't like foam. I like real food.

Key to a good cookbook? The recipes have to work and be easy to follow. They can't presuppose the reader knows something. I've written 17 and I swore I was never going to write another, because I felt like the world really didn't need another book devoted to soups or whatever. But I'm really proud of this book because I feel like it has real heart and soul.

Favorite cookbook, other than your own? I love the Chez Panisse books, maybe because I worked there for so long, and I really love the food and relate to the style of food.

Are people reluctant to cook for you? Yeah. Nobody ever invites me for dinner. And it's funny. I'm really easy. I'll eat anything. Invite me for a bowl of chili.

If I showed up at your house unannounced, what would you serve me? Well, I just made this fabulous carrot and anise soup, so I'd probably serve you that, and some delicious bread and some cheese with a dry riesling. ◆

NIGHT SHIFT

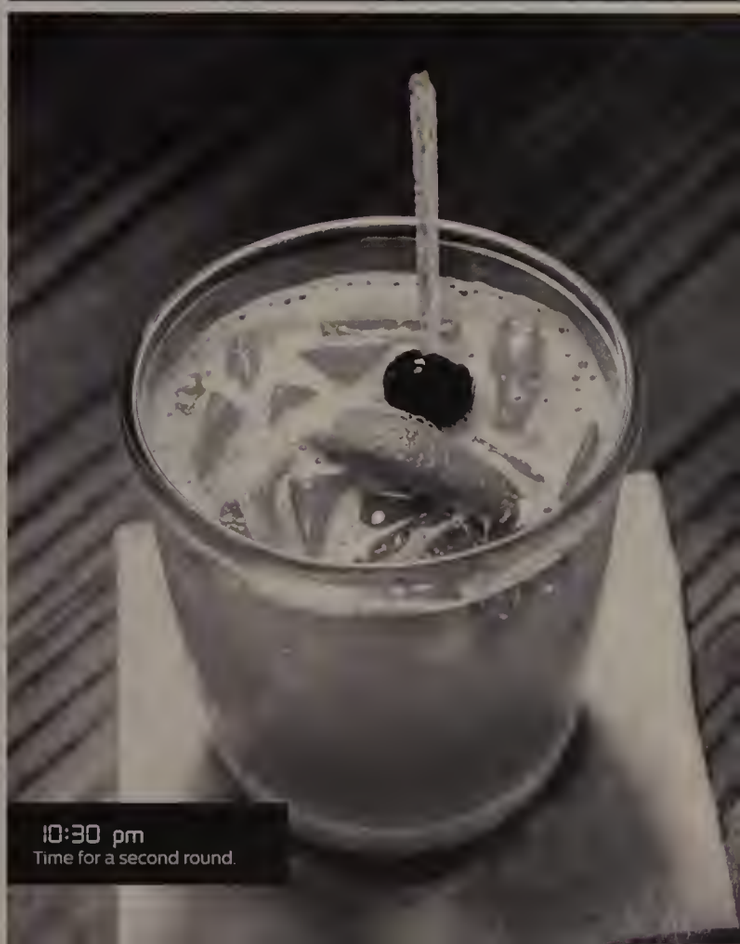
RIDING ALONG ON AN AFTER-HOURS CHEFS' CRAWL

by Alexandra Cavallo

photographed by Diego Navarro

It's sometime near 2 am and I've got work in the morning, but I'm at the bar at J.J. Foley's, regarding an imposing row of pints of Guinness and large shots of Jameson. Earlier in the evening, at a slightly more civilized hour, one of my companions said, "I feel like we should do car bombs tonight. Are you guys car bomb people?" He paused. "If you've never done one, then you are a car bomb person."

THAT WOULD BE chef Matt Foley, executive chef at the Merchant, the casually refined American brasserie that opened in the Financial District in early 2014. We've spent the better part of a Thursday night wandering through Downtown Crossing and Chinatown, in search of food, booze and perhaps a bit of mischief. We're joined by Juan Pedrosa, who took a night off from prepping for the opening of Yvonne's, the much-anticipated supper club set to fill the long-vacant Locke-Ober space this October, where he'll serve as executive chef. Rounding out the group are sisters Irene and Mei Li of popular Chinese-American food truck and restaurant Mei Mei Street Kitchen.



These young guns agreed to indulge me on my quest to get a glimpse at what industry pros get up to when they get off their shifts. In a city where restaurants seem to open and close with increasing frequency, helming a busy restaurant's kitchen is hard, high-pressure work—and chefs have to work in their own meals around preparing them for others. Often, it's only after their restaurant closes, in the wee hours, that they get to indulge themselves.

So we all meet up for cocktails and beers around 10 pm at Silvertone, a favorite after-work haunt of Matt's. Juan and Irene have crossed paths before; the rest of us are meeting for the first time. But nothing makes fast friends like strong drinks and a common goal, and tonight we have both. Armed only with a recorder and an appetite for adventure, I'm ready to see where the night takes us.

Not surprisingly, it takes us to Chinatown. Boston presents itself as buttoned-up city, deferring to 24-hour metropolises like New York when it

MIDNIGHT MUNCHIES

A 'HOOD-BY-'HOOD GUIDE TO A DOZEN MUST-TRY DISHES.

SOUTH BOSTON

Much of Moonshine's menu is available late, but one standout is for night owls only: Don't miss the dirty fried rice with spicy pickled radishes, Chinese sausage and chopped duck liver.

comes to after-hours revelry, but late-night fun can be had if you know where to find it. A large part of that scene goes down in Chinatown.

Our first stop, on Irene's suggestion, is Taiwan Cafe, a tiny, no-frills joint off Beach Street. The hour is creeping toward midnight when we sit at a round family-style table—and we are hungry. We've all had a few drinks and order a round of Heinekens to keep us wet while we peer at the large (and for me, intimidating) menu. Irene takes the lead and rattles off our order expertly: Oyster omelet, fried pork chop, scallion pancake with roast beef and rice cakes with pork.

The dishes are delivered steaming just in time for us to toast their arrival with a second round of Heinekens. We cheer, clink bottles and dig in. I peer at the plates, searching for the rice cakes.

MIDNIGHT MUNCHIES: DOWNTOWN

jm Curley's "Family Meal" gets you a shot of Fernet, a High Life pony and whatever the kitchen feels like cooking, from fried mac 'n' cheese to French toast to chicken backs.

It turns out they're actually small, chewy white spheres that look a bit like water chestnuts and taste nothing like them.

"I find the rice cakes really comforting because I always ate them with preserved greens and vegetables at home with my sister and brother and mom and dad," Irene explains. "Sometimes they're really spicy, so my dad would rinse them off for me before we ate them. I love how chewy they are. They're kind of like a gummy bear in texture." She's right, and I'm not yet sure how I feel about that, though I can't knock the salty, savory flavor from the pork.

"The texture is awesome!" says Juan, who's also never tried them, but doesn't share my reservations.

"I think the shape is supposed to be lucky," Irene says. "It's a very polarizing texture, but we love them." Mei nods her assent, mouth full.

Next, we sample the fried pork chop, which seems made for inebriated snacking. Irene sums it up: "It's crispy first, and then it's greasy, and then it's salty, and then it's sweet. It's like magic. Can't really argue with that." Nobody tries. We all chew silently for a moment in mutual reverence.

Irene takes the lead and rattles off our order expertly: Oyster omelet, fried pork chop, scallion pancake with roast beef and rice cakes with pork.

"The scallion pancake is ridiculous," Juan exclaims. It's true, but it's the oyster omelet that has our attention. It's a head-scratcher, but the sum of its odd parts is delicious. "Somebody was really fucked up when they thought up this," Irene says. "It just comes with this sauce that is, basically, ketchup. On the English menu it's called 'oyster omelet,' and then on the Chinese menu it's called 'oyster pancake,' so you just have to know what you're ordering."

"It's crazy light and crispy and fluffy," Matt raves.

But what's the gooey stuff, we wonder? Irene swigs her Heineken: "If you have to ask, you don't want to know what the gooey stuff is." So we don't ask, and frankly, it doesn't matter because right now that gooey stuff is like salty, oozy manna from munchies heaven.

We're all a little drunk at this point, so the talk turns to drunk food. When it comes to late-night cravings after a few beers, the greasier the better for this crowd. Chefs, they're just like us!

"If we were crawling in Brookline, I could take you to my favorite place for chicken fingers," Irene says. "Dragon Star in Washington Square. But the most wonderful thing there is the crab Rangoon."

"Just give me the crab Rangoon," Matt says. "Just give me fried cream cheese!"

"You don't buy them because you want crab," Mei agrees. "You buy them because you want fried."

Juan is perhaps most eloquent: "You want to fucking dump that shit in duck sauce and suck the fucking cream cheese out of it, turn it inside out, suck the other side," he laughs. "As a kid, that was the one food I was addicted to from Chinese takeout. And I think it's like that for everyone. Because it's one of the more approachable things—you're like, ah, this shit doesn't even taste like crab!"

We agree that we have to get crab Rangoon at our next stop, Peach Farm, and stumble into the night.

It's past 1 am but Peach Farm's subterranean dining room is about a quarter full of late-night diners. We order as soon as we're seated—these chefs know what they want. Singapore noodles (Juan's favorite), salt and pepper soft shell crab, fried duck tongues (I wince in fear at this), two orders of crab Rangoon ("Fuck it," Matt says) and another round of Heinekens.

"I think the misconception of chefs being incredible in the kitchen is, yes, you want to be able to showcase your talent, but we also really enjoy comfort food," Juan says as we tip back our bottles and wait for the feast.

12:45 am

"I'd pass up a dinner at any four-star restaurant to feel good after a long week of working," he continues. "Some chefs binge-watch TV, just to turn it off. I want the cheesiest, biggest pile of nachos that you can fucking throw in my face. And I will eat that and drink margaritas until the sun comes up. I hate saying that to people, because they're like, 'Dude, you cook for a living.' And I'm like, yeah, but I also want to enjoy my life a little, you know what I mean?"

"I had a whole day off once where all I ate was two pints of Ben & Jerry's ice cream," Matt admits to hooting and applause from the table. [Ed. note: He tried to take this admission off the record, but he knows what he did.] "I went back in, and the same person was working.... I was like, 'Oh, uh, it's for my girlfriend.'"

Midnight
It's oyster omelet and fried pork chop o'clock.

ALL NIGHT LONG

CLOCKING IN AT A 24/7 BAKERY

by Meghan Kavanaugh

Vicky Bova-Kluse was just 6 years old when she started working in her grandfather's business, Bova's Bakery, a North End staple that has been operating 24 hours a day for nearly 90 years. With no key to the front door to even lock up, Bova's is open holidays, during extreme weather and—perhaps most importantly—after last call, so late-night tipplers can stumble over to Salem Street for a bite. Bova-Kluse dished about some of those customers and what they crave for a midnight snack.

How has business changed over the years? Years and years and years ago, they would make bread in the middle of the night, and when people would wake up, they would have hot bread in the morning. ... Now you have a lot of families not in Boston anymore, especially in the North End area. You have a lot of young professionals, and they are the late-nighters. After they go to the bars and have their sippy-sippies, they come into Bova's. ... They call us the beacon in the night because we never close.

What are the most popular late-night orders? After 1 o'clock, we make the hot pockets, and there's ham and cheese, spinach and cheese, steak and cheese. They're like a croissant. It almost looks like a turnover...and they are amazing. They are so good and we have lines out the door for those. And you would never think—it's just like a hot pocket. It's just the way they make it. It's a little bit sweet, a little bit salty, and it's delicious. And then we have rice balls...those are a wonderful late-night seller as well. And if people want sweets, we have a smorgasbord full of cannolis.

You must have some stories about the customers that come in after a few rounds at the bar. You see everything. But I do have to say some of the people they just want food and they really don't care what you give them. 'Pick one for me, pick it anything. I'm not fussy just pick it.' ... They're so hungry and famished, and they're so grateful that we're open, they'll take anything.

LET'S DRINK! Hojoko will soon have plenty of company on the izakaya scene in Boston.

IZAKAYA INVASION

by Matt Martinelli

If "izakaya" isn't already in Bostonians' vocabularies, it will be soon. A staple of Japanese nightlife, izakayas—taverns serving drink-friendly food—are inspiring a number of well-regarded chefs here, including Tiffani Faison, who'll soon open Tiger Mama, James Beard Award winner Michael Mina, who'll bring PABU to the Millennium Towers next year, and Sycamore's David Punch, who has a still-unnamed project in the works for Newton. And the izakaya influence is already felt on the menu at Strip-T's in Watertown, as well as at Tim and Nancy Cushman's Hojoko in Fenway's Verb Hotel.

"'Izakaya' technically means to sit and drink sake," Tim Cushman says. "In Japan, when you go to izakayas, they are drinking bars, but they actually do incorporate not only Japanese bar food but Western-influenced foods into the menu. So it's not unusual to have a mixed-up menu."

The true spirit of an izakaya, Cushman says, is to focus on the drinks and accompany them with well-suited snacks, but the kinds of food do vary. Some izakayas in Japan might focus on stews, while another specializes in fish, another in meat. The right mix often includes some raw bar items, as well as a lot of cooked Japanese food and perhaps even some American dishes.

"It's kind of a cool cross-pollination where Japanese folks are loving burgers and stuff. But American folks are loving sushi," Nancy Cushman says. "The izakaya is the perfect place for those two to meet."

The Cushmans have spent a lot of time in Japan and seen how izakayas dot the neighborhoods. And while there's some trepidation that the term might be getting used a little liberally now, they're hoping the local chefs will still let the drinking focus dominate their new spots. And they're confident the market will support as many quality izakayas as chefs can open.

"In Japan, you can really see the owner's personality coming through into the food," Nancy Cushman says. "So by looking at the list of people who have opened an izakaya or are touching on different aspects of one here, everyone is so different and bringing different backgrounds to it that there's room for everybody."

There's a couple seated to our left, and the girl is very drunk. A waiter brings them a large white bucket; they peer inside. Irene explains that he's showing them the live fish they will soon be eating. The drunk girl goggles at her still-swimming meal. I hope she doesn't fall in.

Then the dishes arrive, all at once, and Juan asks the waiter for a side of "spicy sauce" for the Singapore noodles. "The chili sauce is amazing here," he says.

We fall upon the crab Rangoon like people who didn't just come from a whole other meal, sopping up the crispy, greasy, cream-filled pockets with duck sauce and washing it down with the umpteenth round of Heinekens that have appeared seemingly unbidden. (I think Matt ordered them.)

Still, it's the noodles I can't get enough of. I find myself taking seconds and then thirds of the flavorful stir-fried noodles, a mix of curry spice, peppers, pork, shrimp and other seafood delights. I studiously avoid the bowl of duck tongues, but Juan isn't having it.

"I'd pass up a dinner at any four-star restaurant to feel good after a long week of working."

"You'd better take those duck tongues," he orders, nudging them in my direction. They look innocuous enough—small, brown and very fried, they don't resemble any tongue I've ever seen. But still. "They've been in a duck's beak," I protest helplessly.

"It's like making out with a duck!" Mei exclaims. Juan and both sisters put duck tongues between their teeth and waggle them at me lecherously. I sigh and accept defeat. I put a duck tongue in my mouth and chew. It tastes kind of like chicken.

"I'm glad we got these. I've never had them here before," Matt says through a mouthful of fricd tongues. "I'm gonna get them next time."

"They're an awesome snack," Juan agrees. "I wish McDonald's sold duck tongues. I wish I could get a 20-piece McDonald's duck tongues. The McTongue!"

"The first time I had these as a kid they were cold and pickled," Mei recalls. "Not sweet and fried like this. It was a very different scenario."

I swallow my single tongue and go in for a fourth serving of noodles. "Well, you tried them and that's what counts," Juan says.

We lean back in our seats, drunk off beer, good food and good company.

"Everyone's got a full belly," Matt says, clapping his hands together. "Time for car bombs!" ◆

No offense to bacon and eggs, but there are so many other morning meal options in the Hub worth waking up for. The following favorites may have you swearing off standard diner fare for good.

HAM AND MACARONI SOUP

The merry-go-round of pushcart dim sum is great when you've got lots of time and breakfast buddies, but on the other side of Chinatown, newcomer Jook Sing Cafe dishes up Hong Kong-style breakfasts that are great for solo or on-the-go dining. Of particular note: ham and macaroni soup, in which thin slices of deli ham and double-elbow macaroni bob in a clean, full-flavored chicken broth that's made for sipping like savory tea

Hearty, simple yet rather decadent, Lucy Ethiopian Cafe's che'che'bsa is a twofer. Part one is a corn-based pan bread that's crumbled, gently spiced with a sweet-hot berbere blend and sauteed in lots of butter. (The optional scrambled egg for an extra buck adds savory bulk.) Part two is the scoop of ultra-thick, crème fraiche-like yogurt drizzled with honey that offers the ideal sweet, tangy, cool counterpart. Bonus: The che'che'bsa is served all day, so you can even have breakfast for dinner. For an extra-indulgent meal, pair it with the peanut tea, which has nothing to do with brewed leaves and tastes like the liquefied center of a Reese's cup, or the buna be-jebena, Ethiopian coffee prepared in a clay pot, served in traditional cini cups and accompanied by wafting incense.

CHE'CHE'BSA, $8.50-$9.50 AT LUCY ETHIOPIAN CAFE, 334 MASS. AVE., BOSTON (617-536-0415)

Picture a pancake merged with a corn muffin and you've got a cachapa, the Venezuelan corn cake that's a popular roadside snack and a specialty on Orinoco's Sunday brunch menu. The nutty, sweet batter is griddled until golden brown on both sides, stuffed with anything from stretchy mozzarella-like queso de mano—a must-try for cheese lovers—to heartier proteins like stewed pork or beef with black beans and plantains, and finally folded in half like a taco. It's soft, sweet and savory, and it tastes particularly good with a smear of the restaurant's garlicky green mojo sauce.

CACHAPA, $9.75-$14 AT ORINOCO, 477 SHAWMUT AVE., BOSTON (617-369-7075); 22 HARVARD ST., BROOKLINE (617-232-9505); 56 JFK ST., CAMBRIDGE (617-354-6900), ORINOCOKITCHEN.COM

One forkful of the huevos rancheros at Eastie's Taqueria Jalisco and you'll never go back to the version at your neighborhood diner. There are the eggs—griddled perfectly and drenched in a smooth, ultra-savory tomato-based salsa, every drop of which should be mopped up with the accompanying steamed tortillas. And then there's the rest: a heap of rice, refried beans so silky that they pool on the plate, half-moons of firm-but-creamy avocado, a trio of housemade salsas that deliver sour, fiery and grassy heat, and a gratis basket of crunchy tortilla chips with chunky salsa fresca. You'll want a glass of the sweet, cinnamon-laced horchata to wash it all down.

HUEVOS RANCHEROS, $9 AT TAQUERIA JALISCO, 291 BENNINGTON ST., BOSTON (617-567-6367)

If you know Banh Mi Ba Le only for its stellar sandwiches, you're missing out. Open at 5 am, the Dorchester market is also a pre-dawn hub for noodle soups, rice porridges and other Vietnamese breakfast staples that will wake up your palate and serve as the day's most satisfying meal. The friendly counter staff move at a rapid clip, so be ready with your order, be it bun rieu (a sweet, savory pork and crab broth brimming with fried tofu, pork knuckles, congealed pork blood cubes, crab roe, steamed rice noodles and a mountain of shaved herbs and vegetables), chao (chicken-y broken rice porridge with fried shallots, scallions and pork blood cubes) or bánh cuon (chewy, floppy steamed rice noodle sheets, stuffed with minced pork and mushrooms and served with two kinds of springy mild sausage, fried spring rolls, heaps of bean sprouts and herbs and a salty fish sauce-based dip). Before you leave, hit the beverage counter for a fruit smoothie, fresh-pressed sugar cane juice or sweet and rich Vietnamese coffee.

BUN RIEU, $6. CHAO, $5. BÁNH CUON, $5. ALL AT BANH MI BA LE, 1052 DORCHESTER AVE., BOSTON (617-265-7171) BANHMIBALEBOSTON.COM

If you can tear yourself away from the chocolate-halvah croissants and pistachio pop tarts, Sofra's Turkish-style breakfast spread is one of the standouts on the morning menu's savory side. The platter nails contrast, pairing a soft-boiled egg encased in crispy phyllo shreds with cubes of salty-rich fried feta, cucumber coins, jammy tomatoes, black olives, rich yogurt and seasonal housemade preserves—right now, pumpkin spoon sweets.

TURKISH-STYLE BREAKFAST, $9 AT SOFRA BAKERY & CAFÉ, 1 BELMONT ST., CAMBRIDGE (617-661-3161) SOFRABAKERY.COM

Smoked fish isn't just for bagels. At The Haven, JP's charming gastropub that just happens to be the Hub's hub for Scottish fare, one of the weekend brunch specials is a pair of hearty smoked fish cakes in which chunks of rich, salty finnan haddie (smoked haddock) break up a starchy potato base. Over the top, there's a pair of snow-white poached eggs sauced in cherry-pepper hollandaise, which has a vinegary heat that keeps the dish from verging on too rich. (If the sauce packs too much punch, simply tuck into the pile of baby arugula or, better yet, the gratis oatcakes that are meant to be slathered with the accompanying soft, salty butter.)

THE FIRST LADY

The Greek myth of Pygmalion has been the inspiration for popular modern adaptations ranging from Pretty Woman to Mighty Aphrodite to She's All That. The most enduring, however, remains My Fair Lady, further adapted from George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion. Though it moves the action to the 1930s, the Lyric Stage Company's season-opening production of My Fair Lady is a close retelling of the rags-to-riches tale about Eliza Doolittle, a poor Cockney girl who becomes the unwitting subject of an experiment by Henry Higgins, a snooty, upper-class speech therapist determined to mold her into a genteel lady as part of a bet. This intimate take on the oft-staged hit, featuring a cast of 16 and a score full of popular songs like "On the Street Where You Live," plays through Oct. 11 at the Lyric Stage. Alexandra Cavallo

WITCH HUNT Found-footage flicks are a dime a dozen today, largely thanks to the phenomenal success of Daniel Myrick and Eduardo Sánchez's The Blair Witch Project, which premiered at Sundance in 1999 and went on to earn nearly $250 million worldwide. The tale of three Maryland students who set out to capture an urban legend on film so captivated fans that some convinced of the witch's existence overran the town of Burkittsville to get to the bottom of the mystery. Catch the movie that kickstarted it all when the Blair Witch returns as part of the Coolidge Corner Theatre's Flick'r Treats series on Oct. 9 and 10. / *Erin E. Reviews by Brett Michel

Black Mass ★★ If there's one thing journeyman director Scott Cooper (Crazy Heart) gets right in this adaptation of former Boston Globe reporters Dick Lehr and Gerard O'Neill's nonfiction best-seller, it's the puggish, lived-in faces of his supporting cast—like the murderous members of James "Whitey" Bulger's notorious Winter Hill Gang, Rory Cochrane's Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and Jesse Plemons' Kevin Weeks. Alas, Mark Mallouk and Jez Butterworth's screenplay uses their first-person confessions as a framing device, only to drop it just as nonchalantly as Cooper drops Catherine Greig—Sienna Miller was filmed playing Whitey's girlfriend, but she's nowhere onscreen, one of many reasons the movie fails to find the man behind the mobster. Or rather, the man behind the makeup: As Bulger, Johnny Depp never cracks that devilish Whitey smile, probably because he's buried his matinee-idol looks under an immobile mound of prosthetics. And ice-blue contacts make him look more dead than alive—which also describes the film as a whole. It could have been a potent exploration of brotherhood, both literal and figurative (with Benedict Cumberbatch as Billy Bulger and Joel Edgerton as Whitey's townie FBI protector, John Connolly). Instead, Black Mass becomes a movie focused on bullet points rather than hits, chronological reporting lacking any depth or authorial control. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Kendall Square, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Breathe (Respire) ★★★★ The 32-year-old Mélanie Laurent may be best known for her roles in movies like Inglourious Basterds and Now You See Me, but with her sophomore picture as a writer/director, the French actress displays spectacular control behind the camera; she's a natural filmmaker. Adapting Anne-Sophie Brasme's popular young-adult novel with cowriter and fellow actor Julien Lambroschini, Laurent eschews the book's flashback structure, which may upset some readers. But this choice proves absolutely critical, as the film's devastating conclusion wouldn't pack the unsettling punch it does without seeing the friendship of high school students Charlie (Joséphine Japy) and Sarah (Lou de Laâge) develop from front to back. Laurent elicits incredibly naturalistic performances from her relatively inexperienced young leads, charting their intense relationship from tentative bonding to tacit intimacy before taking an unexpected detour into obsession. She's more than just an actors' director, as evidenced by her collaboration with cinematographer Arnaud Potier and editor Guerric Catala, coupled with a masterful use of sound that heightens her psychologically opulent portrait. (At the Museum of Fine Arts, Oct. 1-9.)

The Gift ★★★1/2 Simon (Jason Bateman) and Robyn (Rebecca Hall) move to his hometown of Los Angeles, where they hope to start a family in their spacious new home. A chance encounter with one of Simon's high school classmates becomes just the first of many, as "Gordo the weirdo" (Joel Edgerton) inserts himself into the married couple's lives. When he increasingly shows up on their doorstep, Robyn begins to take a liking to the oddball, but Simon won't have it. Clearly, there's a history between Simon and Gordo, and as Robyn pieces together the details of the two's past relationship, an unsettling truth begins to emerge. Edgerton demonstrates a deft hand at manipulating audience expectations in his writing and directing debut. The 41-year-old Aussie, who has built a strong acting resume during the past two decades, proves that he's just as strong behind the camera, and that's no surprise since he's worked for Ridley Scott (Exodus: God and Kings) and Kathryn Bigelow (Zero Dark Thirty). The result is one of the year's better psychological thrillers. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Goodnight Mommy (Ich seh, Ich seh) ★★★ Nine-year-old twins Lukas and Elias (Lukas and Elias Schwarz) sit with their mother (Susanne Wuest), a slinky Austrian TV host who's been rendered unrecognizable by layers of bandages after a hospital stay. The three are playing a game of "Who Am I?"—where the players must ask "yes" or "no" questions to guess what's written on the notes affixed to their foreheads. It should be relatively easy for her to realize the word reveals her actual identity: "Mama." Strangely, she can't quite recognize herself in the clues...and as the days go by, even the boys have trouble believing that this woman is truly their mother. Why, for example, is this once-sweet woman refusing to even acknowledge the presence of one son, while favoring the other to a suffocating degree? Set within a secluded modern country home surrounded by endless trees, exquisitely captured on 35mm film by cinematographer Martin Gschlacht (Revanche), this art-house chiller with a torture-porn heart may expose its secret early to alert viewers, but suspense remains through the final frames. (At Kendall Square.)

Grandma ★★★1/2 Unseen in a lead film role since Big Business in 1988, Lily Tomlin's enjoying one hell of a year. First, there was her hit Netflix series, Grace and Frankie. Now, the 76-year-old actress and comedian stars in this modest and unexpectedly emotional little gem as Elle, a poet who hasn't published in decades. Elle currently has about $40 to her name, so what's she to do when her granddaughter Sage (Julia Garner) shows up unannounced needing $630 before sundown? Why, set off on an 8-hour journey in her antique Dodge Royal as the two drop in on Cam (Nat Wolff), Sage's deadbeat boyfriend and part of the reason for her troubles. They also visit a couple of Elle's old friends (played by Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox and the late Elizabeth Peña), but it's the encounters with two of Elle's exes that gives the movie much of its heft. Sam Elliott is devastating as Karl, the man she wronged decades before, while Judy Greer—playing Olivia, the younger woman Elle's recently broken up with—is finally given a role to shine in after playing the token mom in three of this summer's blockbusters. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Learning to Drive ★★1/2 Patricia Clarkson is a treasure, but like most actresses of a certain age in Hollywood, she's in need of better scripts. Not that Isabel Coixet's comedy/drama is a bad film—it's better than most pictures that opened in August—but its story of a middle-aged Manhattan book critic taking lessons from a Sikh instructor drives down a very predictable path. Clarkson is Wendy, whose husband of 21 years (Jake Weber) has just left her. Deciding to spend more time with her daughter Tasha (Grace Gummer) in Vermont, Wendy must get a car, but first she needs a license, which is where the lessons with Darwan (Ben Kingsley) come in. He's a cabbie, an American citizen originally from India, and he's being pushed into an arranged marriage. Sarah Kernochan's stagey script is all very sitcomy, but Clarkson and Kingsley (who appeared together in Coixet's Elegy in 2008) make the situations go down easy as the two help each other to get back on the sometimes-bumpy road of life. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Man from U.N.C.L.E. ★★★ The unexpected year of the espionage movie continues with director Guy Ritchie's big-screen reimagining of this 1964-68 TV series. Breezier than the recent Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation, this prequel set in the early '60s suffers slightly by comparison, but it's still quite a bit of fun. Ritchie and co-screenwriter Lionel Wigram (his collaborator on the Robert Downey Jr. Sherlock Holmes films) enjoy paying homage to James Bond just as much as Matthew Vaughn did with Kingsman: The Secret Service and Paul Feig did with Spy. The tone is nearly as comical as those two pictures, while the style is pure Ritchie. Equal-opportunity casting finds Brit Henry Cavill (Man of Steel) starring as American CIA operative Napoleon Solo, while American Armie Hammer (The Lone Ranger) plays slap-prone KGB agent Illya Kuryakin. The two put aside cold-war hostilities (if not tensions) to team up in this surprisingly low-tech thriller, picking up a rocket scientist's daughter (Alicia Vikander) in their mission to stop—you guessed it—an international criminal organization. Spectre, the upcoming, dour-looking Bond picture, could probably spy some tips on how to lighten up from these entertaining men from U.N.C.L.E. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mistress America ★★★ This film enjoyed the best advance buzz of the two pictures that Noah Baumbach directed this year (While We're Young opened last spring), but viewers' mileage may vary. He reunites with his offscreen partner, Greta Gerwig, who cowrites and costars, but the two had better success with their first big collaboration, 2012's Frances Ha, which followed a post-grad drifting through New York. This time, Gerwig cedes center stage to lonely college freshman Tracy (Lola Kirke), whose university experience isn't taking shape as she'd imagined. The guy she likes in her writing class (Matthew Shear) started dating someone else after he and Tracy began hanging out, which is just another day in Manhattan for her. However, her disappointment dissipates when she falls under the wing of her soon-to-be stepsister, Brooke (Gerwig), who's as much a dreamer as Frances—but even more of a mess. In short, Brooke's a great model for the fiction that Tracy's writing. The life lessons are backed by Britta Phillips' and Dean Wareham's synth-heavy score, which would have fit right in with Baumbach's 1995 debut, Kicking and Screaming, another film set among college intellectuals. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Straight Outta Compton ★★★ F. Gary Gray's film burned up the box office, and why not? His chronicle of the five young men who rose above their upbringing in Compton, California, begins in 1987, but it captures the zeitgeist of the Black Lives Matter movement: The police who constantly drive through the frame, threatening to keep our young black heroes in their place, serves to remind us that as much as some things change, most things painfully remain the same. The cast is uniformly terrific in this portrayal of the rise of subversive "gangsta rap" group N.W.A.—made up of Ice Cube (O'Shea Jackson Jr., the real Ice Cube's son), Dr. Dre (Corey Hawkins), Eazy-E (Jason Mitchell), DJ Yella (Neil Brown Jr.) and MC Ren (Aldis Hodge)—who stand up to authority by creating angry anthems such as "Fuck tha Police," which Gray (Ice Cube's director in 1995's Friday) and his writers stage here as a direct response to the group nearly being arrested outside their recording studio simply for being black in the wrong place. Sure, the movie is hagiographic and overstuffed, but like the group, it's electric and not easily silenced. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

The Transporter Refueled ★ The villains in this fourth Transporter film claim they've been working together for 15 years—after the movie's prologue shows them doing evil deeds together in 1995. Clearly, the filmmakers aren't good with basic math, never mind making a movie. In fact, this entire 96-minute Audi ad feels like a test drive for something that should have starred Jason Statham, who took the lead in the previous installments of this goofy action series. His Frank Martin is greatly missed; for a series that feels like a low-rent James Bond on wheels, newcomer Ed Skrein's Frank is like Timothy Dalton to Statham's Sean Connery. Director Camille Delamarre (Brick Mansions) apparently recognized this, so he's supplied Frank with a father, Frank Sr. This sometime sidekick is played by underrated actor Ray Stevenson, who projects more charisma being held hostage on a couch than Skrein does in the entire film. The plot involves four prostitutes (led by Loan Chabanol) intent on taking down their old pimp (Radivoje Bukvic) through a major heist while forcing Frank to act as their getaway driver. The real robbery, however, would be getting you to pay to see this piffle. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Visit ★1/2 Some have hailed this movie as a return to form for writer/director M. Night Shyamalan, and he does return to his hoary old device of building a story backward from a late-movie revelation. But the real twist is that the man Newsweek once proclaimed "the next Spielberg" has simply given up. Working for Jason Blum, producer of the budget-rate Paranormal Activity pictures, Shyamalan finally forgoes his sense of craft, employing a variation on the "found footage" gimmick of those cheapies and the granddaddy of the genre, The Blair Witch Project, which just happened to open the week before his breakout success, 1999's The Sixth Sense. (You're a bit late to the party, M.) Nevertheless, Shyamalan does display his Spielberg-like gift for pulling strong performances out of young actors. Fifteen-year-old

Becca and her younger brother, Tyler (Australian talents Olivia DeJonge and Ed Oxenbould), are sent by their single mom (Kathryn Hahn) to the remote Pennsylvania farm of the increasingly odd grandparents they've never met (Deanna Dunagan and Peter McRobbie). Budding filmmaker Becca and her bro document the weeklong visit on video, and while they don't see dead people, they do see dirty adult diapers. We just see crap. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

A Walk in the Woods ★1/2 Based on travel writer Bill Bryson's 1998 best-seller, a comedic chronicle of his hike through the 2,118-mile Appalachian Trail with old friend Stephen Katz while both were in their late 40s, this adventure comedy from director Ken Kwapis (The Sisterhood of the Traveling Pants) gives both adventure and comedy a bad name. Casting much older actors as Bryson (79-year-old Robert Redford) and Katz (74-year-old Nick Nolte) might have looked good on paper, but the relaxed Redford and antic Nolte are about as believable as friends as a pairing of Gore Vidal and William F. Buckley would be—but with even less chemistry. Redford and Nolte spend a good deal of the third act stranded on a ledge after they've tumbled off a cliff (Kwapis loves his pratfalls), but the ledge is clearly on a soundstage, carved out of foam and painted, Star Trek-style, then composited into a real location. These pieces fit together about as well as Redford and Nolte do. "There are these things called books," Bryson tells Katz at one point. "They're like TV, for smart people." You're better off reading Bryson's travelogue than slogging through the wilderness with these two for 104 interminable minutes. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

TEEN TITANS In the title track of their debut album, the duo behind Girlpool reminisce about the ease of childhood: "I just miss how it felt standing next to you / Wearing matching dresses before the world was big." That time isn't so distant a memory: Girlpool guitarist Cleo Tucker is just 18, and bassist Harmony Tividad is 19. But the LA natives seem wise beyond their years, having harnessed a minimalist but powerful punk sound that pairs raw vocals with frank lyrics on grownup topics, from sex to privilege to empowerment. You'll have two chances to catch the twosome, who play the Middle East on Oct. 5-6. / Carly Olson

MUSEUMS & GALLERIES

Edited by Sarah Hagman

FREEZE FRAME When MIT professor Harold "Doc" Edgerton synched up a stroboscope with his high-speed motion-picture camera, he made it possible to capture blink-and-you'll-miss-it moments. His Coronet, an image of a single droplet of milk, was included in the Museum of Modern Art's debut photography exhibit in 1937. His work later helped document Jacques Cousteau's underwater explorations and allowed nighttime reconnaissance for the Normandy invasion. It also revolutionized sports photography, and in new exhibit Hummingbird, artist Todd Pavlisko combines photos from Edgerton's estate with shots of Kareem Abdul-Jabbar's killer slam-dunk and other vintage NBA posters. Flash back at Samsoñ, where Hummingbird is on view through Oct. 24. Sarah Hagman

WHAT'S NEXT? PORT AND PIERCINGS?

There are worse ways to fritter away a Friday night than sipping wine harborside at the Institute of Contemporary Art and adding some bling to some old thing.

The inaugural evening of the museum's new Friday night series, ICA After 5, was entitled Bubbles + Bedazzling. A wine tasting of assorted bubbly was accompanied by bedazzling instruction from local artist Melissa Thyden, and in addition to sampling prosecco, cava and what not while glue-gunning crystals onto purses and jackets, guests were treated to one of September's prettiest sunsets.

Present and accounted for: fundraising guru Liz Saltonstall, Jamaica Plain denizen Fede Murara and dashing doctor Daniel Reilly, distinguished shrink Michael Lafarr, museum head honcha Jill Medvedow and her newly minted lawyer son, Noah Kazis, Back Bay glamazon Lori Sullivan, the uber-suave Nelse Clark, redheaded raconteur Michael Ratty and his gorgeous wife, Amy Deveau, and one woman who said, "I'm not bedazzling. I'm just bubbling."

Yours truly went home with some rhinestones tastefully decorating the inside pocket of my blazer, and it was a uniformly delightful evening, although one guest expressed disappointment that none of the women had opted to get "vajazzled."

"Given the hot-glue-gun factor, I think that would require something a bit stronger than Champagne," said someone else, while a third person piped in: "You never know. It's the ICA at night; things can get pretty freaky pretty fast."

BETTER THAN TINDER

As the main provider of toys and games for Boston Medical Center, Boredom Busters isn't a hard group to get behind—but when you add in the attractive and eclectic crowd their parties attract, it's a no-brainer.

Although goofily titled, the Fun-Raising Fund-Raiser, held at the Benjamin Franklin Institute of Technology, was a superb event, drawing the likes of Columbus Hospitality cutie Lisa Flores, the natty Will Natoli, real estate mack daddy Collin Bray, brunette bombshells Nidhi Anand and Natasha Fahey, handsome young do-gooder Jonathan Berk, the absurdly good-looking Ross Chanowski, blond beauty Lindsay O'Hara, the super-suave Bryant Roche-Bernard, the disarmingly charming Ed Chung, and founders Charlie Benzyk and Dave Krauss, who started the charity in memory of a friend who died during their freshman year at Duke (which explains all the Blue Devils in the room).

The Dave Maeklin Band rocked the house, while a killer noodle bar made sure no one got too rocked at the open bar, and people bid on prizes like a skydiving package in the silent auction. Best of all: The speechifying was kept to under five minutes, quite possibly a record for a Boston charity event.

Meanwhile, the evening's best exchange was overheard by the bar: "We met at Whiskey Bar."

"And you admit that?" ◆

VERY GOOD SPORTS

CONFESSION TIME: I AM THE least sports-savvy person I know. But while I barely know a puck from a parquet, I'm still a huge fan of this issue. Maybe I was hooked by John Huet's killer portraits of Bruins and Celtics players, which turned out so well that we just had to showcase them on dual covers—something we've only done twice before in the magazine's history. Or maybe it was the accompanying profiles, which offer a little something for everyone, whether you're interested in the athletes' aims for the season ahead or (like me) would rather read about their go-to emoji and playlist faves. Then again, maybe it was Sarah Hagman's take on the arena the two teams share, or her look at the history-making National Women's Hockey League, which was founded by a Northeastern alum and boasts the Boston Pride as one of its first four teams. Or perhaps it was Matt Martinelli's chat with a beloved fixture of Celtics games, or Alexandra Cavallo's story on a locally developed fitness device already being used by NBA, NHL and Olympic athletes. Of course, there's plenty of non-sporty fun in this issue too, from Meghan Kavanaugh's Q&A with trans activist Jennifer Finney Boylan to Scott Kearnan's sneak peek at the divine design at a new fashion destination. Hope you find something to cheer for too.

BREAKING THE ICE

FEMALE PRO HOCKEY PLAYERS GET A NEW LEAGUE—AND SALARIES.

SHINING KNIGHT: Hilary Knight is hearing from fans excited for the NWHL.

Power Play

The City of Champions will have yet another team to root for come Nov. 22, when the puck drops at Boston Pride's first home match at Harvard's Bright-Landry Center. Fans can thank Northeastern grad Dani Rylan, who's spent the past year and a half putting together the National Women's Hockey League. It's the first in North America to offer health insurance, equipment and salaries, a big deal for athletes who train around nine-to-fives as teachers, nurses, financial advisers and mechanical engineers.

The dream doesn't stop there for Rylan, who also hopes NWHL players receive recognition beyond the long-awaited financial compensation, a goal Boston Pride forward and two-time Olympian Hilary Knight happens to share. "As Olympic athletes, here we are around this great stage. We're representing our country, and then it's sort of like 'poof,' " Knight says. "We've been told we're only good every four years, essentially." So it's easy to see how she didn't quite believe Rylan's concept at first. "You're sitting back thinking, 'Is this real?' because you don't have that self-belief of what value you bring to the table."

But that's all about to change—in fact, it's already starting. A couple of years ago, Knight was picking up her equipment at an airport baggage claim when a passerby felt the need to tell her she wasn't a professional athlete because she wasn't paid. This year, the scenario repeated itself, only this airport patron stopped Knight to express excitement about the new league. "It's going to put women's ice hockey on a whole new level," she says, adding it will not only develop the fan base, but also get younger girls into the sport. That's another long-term goal for Rylan, who's looking forward to a stacked draft decades from now. "Every once in a while a parent will come up to me and say, 'Thank you for giving my daughter the same opportunity [as my son].' " That, Rylan says, "makes it all worth it." / Sarah Hagman

CONFESSIONS OF A JUMBOTRON STAR

NO. 1 FAN: Carl Lenhart grew up in India watching Bob Cousy and

For Celtics fans, no home game is complete without a sighting of Carl Lenhart, 71, in his tan blazer, pounding his chest to pump up the fans. Before the season opener, he chatted about what goes into being a fan favorite. / Matt Martinelli

ON HIS FIRST JUMBOTRON SHOWING: It was not until May [2008]. I was there the whole year and hadn't been on the Jumbotron. It gave me time to think "If they ever get me on that, what am I going to do? I don't want to just be an idiot." I'd been very impressed by [Kevin Garnett] and the passion he had for the game. ... As part of his pregame routine, he comes to the crowd and does that chest bump, and I thought, "This guy is not forgetting us." And I said, "When I go on the Jumbotron, that's what I'm going to do."

ON HIS WARDROBE: I wore the jacket because it's what I had and it was warm. As it turns out, the jacket was like the color of the parquet floor. I'd say, "I look just like that floor." I also usually wear No. 34 a [Paul] Pierce jersey. ... I didn't wear the jacket for one of the games in the Finals in 2008, and boy did people get on me about that. We won the game, but if we had lost, I would've been in trouble. I thought right then, "Uh oh, I'm kind of becoming the property of the fans."

ON HIS STREET CRED: I get recognized on the street by strangers. They'll roll the window down and say, "Hey, you going to the game tonight?" Once, I was at Heathrow Airport in London, and I got recognized there

ON HIS TIP FOR THE JUMBOTRON OPERATOR: I like it at the beginning, when I have that emotion. I'm ready to explode myself on that court. So, get me then. And then at the end, when they want the crowd to get revved up, go to me. I'm so honored when they do that.

WHOOP, THERE IT IS

The newly launched WHOOP may look a bit like a Fitbit, but "it isn't a wearable or a device as much as it is an overall system," says local founder Will Ahmed, who got interested in the impact of sleep, strain and recovery on athletes while playing squash at Harvard. Now WHOOP measures those factors by collecting 150 MB of daily data on heart rate, motion, skin conductivity and other variables that can be shared with coaches and fellow athletes on a team dashboard. "Thirty percent of athletes are actually overtrained," says Ahmed, who hopes the system will help users optimize training and prevent injury. It's an idea that's clinched his company $12 million in recent funding, which will be used to target pro and college teams. But Ahmed says that eventually amateur athletes "who take fitness seriously" will be able to WHOOP their butts into shape too. / Alexondro Covollo

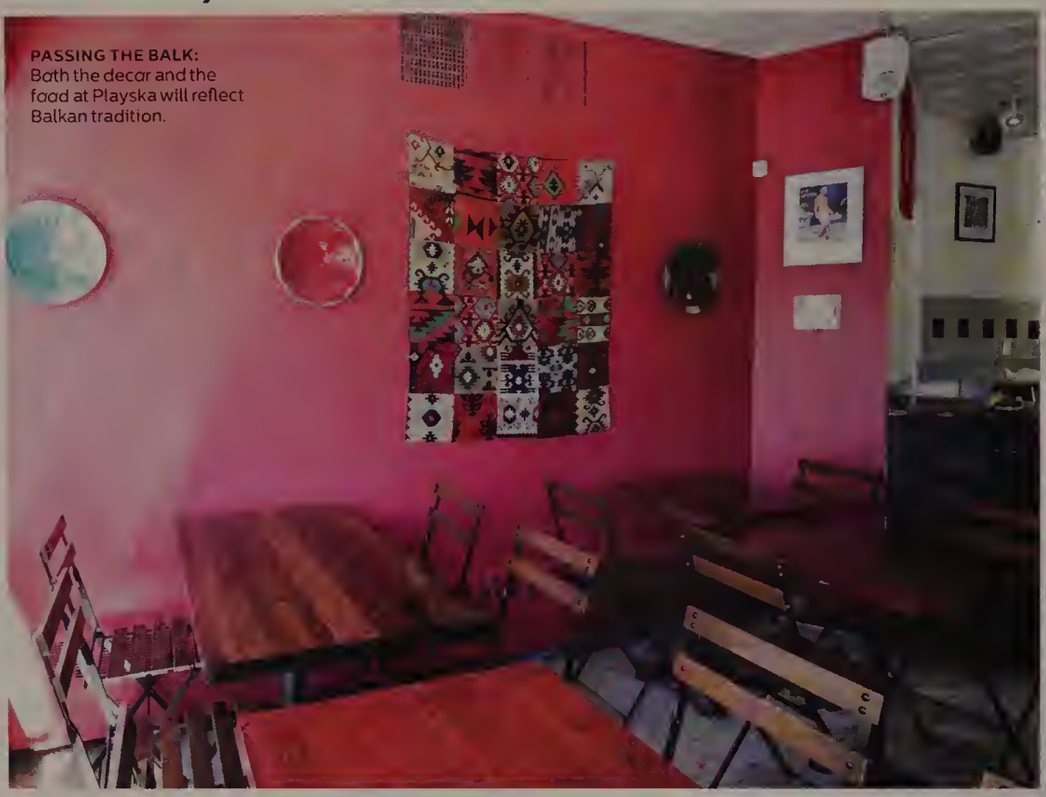
IMPORTED FROM IRELAND

Dream Catcher®

Legendary Toasted Chestnut Liqueur

The origins of Dream Catcher, an old Gaelic recipe, started in a historic farm house with a pot still in County Cavan, Ireland.

A farmer was inspired to blend an elixir of the natural flavor of toasted chestnuts and other natural flavors with select Irish Spirits to create the superb taste of a toasted Irish Liqueur. This wonderful treasure was discovered several years ago and is now coming to the world.



The farmer claimed it was a "Dream worth catching".

Dream Catcher Hot Chestnut

Pour a shot of Dream Catcher into a brandy glass. Top with an equal part of very hot water. Savor the spectacular, warm taste of toasted chestnuts with select Irish Spirits.

PASSING THE BALK: Both the decor and the food at Playska will reflect Balkan tradition.

TIME TO PLAY

TIM WIECHMANN BRINGS BALKAN FLAVORS TO INMAN SQUARE.

Playska
243 Hampshire St., Cambridge
playska.com

It's easy to figure out why Tim Wiechmann's forthcoming fast-casual bakery and cafe is called Playska. That's the name of the menu's signature sandwich. But many locals may wonder: "What exactly is a playska?"

It's the type of question Wiechmann looks forward to answering often as he whips up Balkan cuisine at the Inman Square spot. "I think the food from the Balkans is awesome. It's not really popular or known about in the States," says the chef/owner of Bronwyn and T.W. Food. "I've been there a bunch of times and thought, 'This food is so awesome. How do I work this out to bring it here?'"

For the record, a playska is derived from a pljeskavica, a Balkan street-food patty made with ground lamb, pork, beef or veal, served here on a housemade pogacha roll with flecks of bacon and topped with a red-pepper sauce and a cream cheese.

That sandwich is far from the only food that Wiechmann is psyched to serve at his new spot, slated to open in late fall. He'll also be showcasing ground meat in cevapcici, little finger sausages made in Bosnia that will be served on pita bread with a yogurt sauce. And there will be Balkan pies, made from hand-stretched phyllo dough and stuffed with savory seasonal fillings such as feta with sausage or kale.

"It's halfway between a spanakopita and a strudel," Wiechmann says of the pies. "They're very particular about them when you go there. I'm hoping to uphold their level of quality."

That quality is expected to carry over to the pastries and breads, such as challah, and the coffee from Karma, a boutique roaster in Sudbury. Such fare will be available for take-out and sit-down service from breakfast to dinner in the 16-seat space, located in the former home of Rosie's Bakery and decorated with plenty of memorabilia from the Balkans.

In addition to helping to educate Bostonians about Balkan cuisine, Wiechmann is looking forward to doing a little bit of learning himself. "One of the things that's awesome is I'm going to essentially own a bakery. I've studied a little bit of baking, and in all of my restaurants we do our own breads, but this is me full-on figuring out how to be a baker, too," he says. "I'm really excited about bringing a unique cuisine to Boston again, and doing something that's accessible and not fine dining. It's just unique."

Good Eats: Oodles of Noodles

Hand-pulled noodles now have a serious foothold in Boston's Chinese food scene, but it's only recently that we've had a local source for the style known as dao xiao mian. Live Noodles, opened in Packard's Corner by a former co-owner of MDM Noodles, features the so-called sliced, shaved or knife-cut variety that are peeled from a block of dense wheat dough with a sharp blade. The slick, chewy, ragged-edged ribbons are served either stir-fried with crisp bok choy, bean sprouts, scallions and a protein of your choice or swimming in a deep bowl of meaty broth. / Elizabeth Bomze

INTELLIGENT DESIGN

FURNISHING FASHION

This month, Kit and Ace, the fast-growing Canadian fashion brand helmed by the former lead designer of Lululemon, opened a 3,500-square-foot shop on Newbury Street. Refreshing your wardrobe? Great. It has you covered in technical cashmere and other luxury fabrics designed to maintain shape, avoid pilling and work in the wash. Outfitting a room? Excellent. Find inspiration in the local artisans Kit and Ace tapped to create the store's "supper club" section, which will host pop-up dinner parties for movers and shakers of the local creative class. We got to know the clever craftsmen behind the store's sleek look. / Scott Keornon

BRIGHT IDEAS: "I like the authenticity of showing how things are screwed together," says Alex Jaynes of Charlestown's A. Jaynes Woodworks, who created this abstract lighting fixture tacked with exposed copper nails. Its hand-planed ash arms were bent with steam and capped with copper cylinders, each bearing a light bulb powered by cords sheathed in blue fabric.

PHOTO FINISH: Dubbed Death Valley, 2015, this work featuring a photograph sliced and backlit on blue plexiglass was created by MassArt alum and staffer Clint Baclawski, who'll present a solo exhibition of his art at Adelson Galleries in June.

SETTING THE TABLE: Boston's Structure Design and Build created the 8x8-foot table of local wood procured from a family-run sawmill, collaborating with Rhode Island's Whetstone Workshop on the copper gilding around the metal base. SD&B also designed the benches, which "nod to New England maritime culture," says owner Peter Jackson Hussey.

TAKE A SEAT: Six chairs from Infusion Furniture tweaked an e[illegible] design by the Milton firm, says owner Quentin Kelley. Some modifications, like the splayed front legs, yielded what is now sold as Infusion's K&A Dining Chair. Kelley adds that the contoured seat of ash wood, popular in the Scandinavian design that inspires him, is surprisingly comfy on the tush.

BLAZING AHEAD: Brunswick Park's men's blazer is priced at $179 for early backers.

A New Brunswick

Kit and Ace isn't the only newcomer plying performance wear for sweater weather. "You know that layer you have on the back of your chair at work? We want that to be Brunswick Park," says Jess Garbarino, cofounder of the new Boston-based apparel brand, which met its $25,000 fundraising goal on Sept. 29, less than 24 hours into its Kickstarter campaign. In February, backers can expect shipments of Brunswick Park's first batch of hoodies, bomber jackets and blazers, made from a machine-washable custom merino wool blend designed to wick moisture, keep its shape and stretch for comfort. "[Cofounder Alex Weaver and I] are both pretty entrenched in the startup community here in Boston, and our day-to-day schedules have us running all over the city. We didn't have pieces that could keep up with us," says Garbarino, who named the brand after the street she grew up on in Melrose. "Coincidentally, Brunswick is also the name of the town where Alex went to college. It was pretty serendipitous." / Jacqueline Houton

OREGON, HAIL!

The best place in the U.S. to produce pinot noir is debatable, but Oregon's Willamette Valley has to be in the discussion. Its cool, sunny and dry climate (at least until the heavens open each autumn with relentless rain) generally enables the region's artisanal producers to fashion pinots in a less flamboyantly fruity style, with understatement and delicate flavor nuance. This is one category where most of the examples are good. The following three are exceptional. / Sondy Block

BENTON-LANE PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
Produced by one of the many pinot-obsessed refugees who headed north from California in a quest for the perfect pinot noir terroir, Benton-Lane has been around for more than 25 years, which makes it a relative old-timer in Willamette Valley. With earthy and floral scents, and cherry, smoky, beet root-like flavors, this bottle is a savory mouthful of delicious pinot noir fruit that's tart and minerally on the palate. This wine is built for food, so try it with grilled salmon or chicken breast.
$27 Whole Foods Cambridge

ROCO PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
A relatively new venture by Rollin Soles, a highly regarded winemaker for years at Argyle, Roco is a small player that does everything from harvesting to production by hand. This pinot is right on the mark: highly aromatic with mint, baking spice and clove aromas, lush on the palate with red berries, some mineral earthiness and a smooth texture. It's a balanced drink with enough flavor to enjoy on its own or with a range of food from cheeses to medium-textured fish.
$30, Lower Falls Wine Co., Newton

LANGE PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
Lange is one of many small family wineries in Oregon that consistently makes excellent wine, but this vintage really stands out. A juicy pinot noir, the best of a recent blind tasting, this bottle features toasty, dark cherry and plum flavors accented by spice, mint, tar and leather. This wine is well structured, round and minerally, with a silky sensual texture. It will pair especially well with slightly spicy duck or lamb preparations.

Q&A
TRANSCENDENT

Jennifer Finney Boylan is a busy woman. In addition to teaching at Barnard College, consulting for Tronsporent and I Am Coit and serving as a GLAAD board co-chair, Boylan has authored more than a dozen books, including the best-selling memoir She's Not There: A Life in Two Genders and the forthcoming novel Long Block Veil. She will head to Boston Oct. 16-17 to receive the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders Spirit of Justice Award and host a reading of her memoir—but first, she squeezed in a chat with us. / Meghon Kovonough

HAVE YOUR THOUGHTS ON YOUR MEMOIR CHANGED WITH TIME? After I wrote that book I read it a lot. I sat in bed, holding it in my hands, kind of unable to believe that it was real. Then, after I got over myself, I put the book aside for a long time. I don't know if I read it at all until 2012, when I began to prepare the revised 10th anniversary edition. There were so many things I would have changed or corrected, now that I am 10 years smarter about the complexities of transgender experience, but for the most part I let everything stay the same As the saying goes, I stand by all my mistakes. The new edition does have a short new introduction and two new "epilogue" chapters, one by me and one by my wife

WHAT'S BEEN A POSITIVE OUTCOME OF WORKING ON I AM CAIT? Caitlyn [Jenner] is a very unusual person—not only because of her history but also because of her privilege. No one in their right mind should confuse her with a typical transgender person. That said, just the tremendous visibility of her coming out put our stories on the radar

YOU'VE WORKED IN SO MANY DIFFERENT ARENAS—WHAT IS YOUR DREAM PROJECT? In my fantasy world, I have a one-woman show that consists of me telling stories and performing my original songs. Of course, an obstacle to this is that one of the instruments that I play is the autoharp . Also, I have a voice kind of like Rochester from The Jock Benny Show Still, a girl can dream

RHYMING ROMANCES

LOVE AFFAIRS PAST AND PRESENT ALIGN IN A LOCALLY SET NOVEL.

Amherst* by William Nicholson
Published by Simon & Schuster, 304 pages, $26

GHOSTLY EVEN WHEN SHE WAS alive, poet Emily Dickinson hovers over everyone in this book. Her married brother Austin has an affair with the younger Mabel, who's also married, leading Austin to totally disregard his actual family. Mabel's husband cheerfully enables the affair, and Emily tacitly encourages them, listening at the door, even observing the bodice unlacing. Nicholson conveys the pair's romance both in their authentic 1880s language, found in letters and diaries, and in his own words, which sometimes feel suspiciously modern but often resemble the 19th-century lovers' rapturous declarations.

Fast-forward to the present, and we meet Alice, who is writing a screenplay about the drama that played out in Amherst—which included Mabel collecting Emily's poems and getting them published posthumously, clinching her fame. During her research, Alice gets involved with the married Nick, an older, sexy lapsed professor. While she puzzles out the intricacies of the long-ago affair, Nick emerges as Emily's double of sorts, a maddeningly elusive man half in love with death. Nicholson has all his characters wondering what love is: an ideology, an actual relationship, passion? It can get rather cerebral, but Nicholson, an Oscar-nominated screenwriter himself, also gives us a story that evokes the juicy angst of love and loss.

FROM PAGE 109: Emily was beyond fear or favor. She had never set eyes on Mabel. She was the Myth. She lived apart, accepting the pain and the freedom of loneliness. For all these reasons, Mabel bowed her head before her, almost in worship. And now, she learned, her deity graciously received her prayers, and smiled upon her. ◆

BUENAS VISTAS: Stunning architecture, murals and contemporary art mix in Mexico City.

Traveler's Checks

With six nonstop Aeromexico flights from Boston every week, getting to Mexico City has never been easier. Once there, don't discount the newly rehabilitated neighborhoods. Condesa, the district that was home to the old horse racing track, has chic boutique hotels, like the Hippodrome, and is centrally located.

At an altitude of 7,382 feet, the weather is spring-like year-round; there's never a bad time to visit, but July is surprisingly ideal. It rains for an hour or two nearly every day, which keeps things crisp, while temperatures tend to hover in the 70s during the day and the 50s at night.

CAPITAL CULTURE

ARTISTIC RICHES AWAIT SOUTH OF THE BORDER IN MEXICO CITY.

Americans tend to regard Mexico City as a congested, crime-infested volcano crater. Not true. Starting in the 1990s, efforts to clean the air (once so bad that birds were said to drop dead midflight) have resulted in drastically reduced pollution, while the city's reputation for street crime (also drastically reduced) is no more warranted than in any other major metropolis. As a result, visitors can now often see the ring of mountain peaks surrounding the city from the downtown traffic circle dominated by the iconic Ángel de la Independencia, and wandering the streets after dark feels no more threatening than it does in Manhattan. What's more, few places in the Western Hemisphere rival the D.F., as it's affectionately known, for art, architecture, design and cuisine. From the pre-colonial days (when a spectacular Aztec metropolis floated in the middle of a lake) through the Spanish colonial era, the Revolution of 1910 and today, the sensory has always been central, and for anyone with an ounce of imagination, Mexico City is a veritable smorgasbord.

A pillar of the city's artistic patrimony is muralism, and its birthplace is the Antiguo Colegio de San Ildefonso, a 16th-century Jesuit college-turned-cultural center, where visitors can see Diego Rivera's first mural and feast on the satirical work of José Clemente Orozco, which chronicles the country's political and social struggles and covers much of the interior courtyards. For lovers of Rivera and his iconic wife, Frida Kahlo, two pilgrimages are necessary. The first is the Museo Casa Estudio Diego Rivera y Frida Kahlo, the artists' studio/living space built in 1931, one of the earliest examples of functionalist architecture. The couple lived there during their tumultuous marriage, but equally significant to their story is the Casa Azul, Kahlo's childhood home and the place where she died. Also known as the Frida Kahlo Museum, it now houses much of her art and personal belongings.

As for contemporary art, the Mexico City scene is booming, and while the Tamayo Museum in Chapultepec Park is justifiably world-famous, the breadth is best experienced in lesser-known spaces. Ground zero is Kurimanzutto, a gallery/collective that hosted a show by enfant terrible Dr. Lakra this past summer and represents more than 30 of Mexico's top working artists. Meanwhile, the Museo Jumex—built by the heir to the Mexican fruit juice fortune—spans 45,000 square feet and is said to hold the largest private contemporary art collection in Latin America, and it's open to the public. Two other gold mines are the Museo Universitario Arte Contemporáneo and the "El Chopo" University Museum, housed in the former National History Museum, which exhibits edgy, thought-provoking work, including a recent show on the gay rights movement. And the lazy culture vulture need walk no farther than one square city block to see the World Heritage Site home of Pritzker Prize-winning modernist architect Luis Barragán, the Archivo Diseño y Arquitectura (founded in 2012 by Fernando Romero and his wife, Soumaya Slim, daughter of Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim), and the cutting-edge gallery Labor.

If all of this sounds dizzying, it is, but it's a testament to the artistic renaissance taking place in Mexico City, which is transforming neighborhoods where tourists would never previously visit into must-sees. Santa Maria la Ribera, which was devastated by the 1985 earthquake, is re-emerging as an artsy, bohemian neighborhood; it's also home to the incomparably beautiful Moorish Kiosk, designed to serve as Mexico's pavilion at the 1884 Universal Exhibition. Meanwhile, the Roma district has become the epicenter of hipster culture, with restaurants, clubs, bars, shops and galleries redolent of Brooklyn.

Alas, man does not live on art alone, but fortunately the city's culinary scene is keeping pace with its art, architecture and design. Pujol has had tongues wagging since it opened in the early aughts, Chapulín offers fine dining wrapped in high design, and Quintonil—No. 35 on the 2015 list of "The World's 50 Best Restaurants"—serves up a modernist take on traditional Mexican fare. Basque-meets-Mexican restaurant Biko also earned a spot on the top-50 list, but even off-the-beaten-track places like Casa Virginia serve superb food. Little wonder that Mexico City has surfaced on every foodie's short list as a dining destination.

Once upon a time, a stroll around the Zocalo and an opera at the Palace of Fine Arts was the sine qua non of culture in Mexico City. Now, the needle's been moved and the options beggar description. So the next time your neighbors plan a trip to Cancun or Cabo, opt for the artistic riches of Mexico's capital. You'll come back with much more than a tan. ◆

HOJOKO

Upmarket Asian cuisine is enjoying a boomlet in Boston. Banyan is already drawing South End crowds with its beautiful room and glamorous East/West fusion. Top Chef star Tiffani Faison is about to debut Tiger Mama in the Fenway, while David Punch is set to open Little Big Diner in Newton Centre. The latest addition to this umami-rich stew is Hojoko, from Tim and Nancy Cushman, owners of O Ya, the modern Japanese eatery that is the city's most expensive restaurant. If you've been hoping to sample the Cushmans' nationally acclaimed work but balked at O Ya's tariff, Hojoko is your relatively budget-priced ticket.

Set in Fenway's rock 'n' roll-themed Verb Hotel (once a Howard Johnson's, get it?), Hojoko has none of O Ya's temple-like serenity: It's a rollicking, capacious tavern set to a deafening rock soundtrack, hallucinogenically overstuffed with rock and surf bric-a-brac and Japanese pop-culture kitsch. A long bar is the room's centerpiece, drink-slinging a clear priority. Colorful tropical punches and hoary dating-bar drinks flow from big tanks ($7 shot, $12 drink, $48 bowl), like the Blue Hawaiian of rum, pineapple, sochu, lemon and blue Curaçao, and the Japanese Caucasian ($12), a frozen White Russian variant. Old-time Tiki lovers will appreciate the Jungle Bird ($12) of rum, coconut-infused Campari, pineapple and lime, served in a ceramic parrot mug. There's a sake for every taste: 19 in cups ($6-$18), six in 1.8-liter bottles ($100-$188). Fourteen beers on tap and in bottles ($5-$8) and five large-formats ($12-$24) favor light, food-friendly Asian brews like Okinawan rice lager Orion ($6), plus some craftier Americans. Wines are few and modest ($9-$12 glass, most bottles $35-$45). Belying the overarching fun-fun-fun aesthetic, bartenders are precise and well-versed in more serious craft cocktails. Not many Boston bars are so versatile, executing equally well on cocktails both sublime and ridiculous.

Executive chef Hart Lowry's menu embodies a like-minded combination of wit and seriousness, creativity and tradition. Nigiri and sashimi for one ($26; on one visit, tuna, mackerel and salmon sashimi and chutoro, salmon and yellowtail nigiri) offers delicately cut, pristine fish and well-seasoned sushi rice. Fancier rolls let their central ingredients shine via admirable restraint with sauces, as in fried wild black miso cod roll ($8/$16) with dashi-pickle tartar sauce, a spam-like prep of foie gras ($8/$16) with robata (charcoal-grilled) pineapple and yuzu kosho, and especially robata Maine lobster tail ($12/$24) with tomalley rice, sake/sea-urchin jus and citrus zest. These offer a glimmer of O Ya's invention, subtlety and impeccable ingredients at far gentler prices.

Robata skewers, a standby of Japanese after-work drinking joints, offer a delectable few bites. Standouts include fat whole prawns ($12) with spicy ponzu butter, crispy chicken tails ($7) with black-truffle salt (yes, chicken butt is a delicacy), and tender buttermilk-brined chicken livers ($7) with ponzu-garlic butter. A rare misfire is tsukune ($8), a long chicken meatball with raw egg-yolk dip, thanks to harsh oversalting. More beautiful and balanced is the outstanding hamachi kama ($15), fatty collar of yellowtail showered with spicy daikon, shiso, seaweed and scallion, plus ponzu for dipping. Salmon fins ($7) offers two chunks of crisp-fried salmon belly nestled in translucent garlic-chive sauce with the barest whiff of truffle salt.

Ramen lovers are treated with appetizer-sized bowls of alkaline noodles in luscious broths. Funky chicken ramen ($9) wows with a deep-flavored chicken broth and toppings of soy egg, fermented bamboo shoots and charcoal-grilled chicken. Hot dog ramen ($12) impresses with a rich pork-bone broth, scallions, nori and a crown of salty grilled frankfurter artfully sliced into a squiggly tangle. Curry somen jiru ($8) builds winsomely on skinny, pale wheat noodles and tender slices of braised chicken with a light curry/dashi broth dotted with shiitakes, scallions and daikon.

Cold dishes include a fabulous tuna poke ($11), the Hawaiian salad of raw tuna cubes, nicely balancing chili fire with creamy roasted-macadamia dressing and avocado. Potato edamame salad ($5) with dashi pickles, scallions and bonito flakes is a bowl of mild comfort. Tsukemono ($5) prettily presents three bracing seasonal pickles like kimchi, daikon and charred ramps. No self-styled tavern can do without a burger; here, the spicy tuna burger ($17) delivers a complex wallop of flavors, layering greens, pickled ginger, tomato, scallions and spicy mustard, punctuated by the surprising smack of sweet-glazed broiled eel.

Service is appropriately brash and informal, showing impressive command of the long menu and admirable accuracy in capturing orders amid the din. Note that a typical procession of drinks and plates can quickly add up. While not reaching mortgage-payment heights, the tab may surprise diners used to less-refined Asian restaurants: Budget for a higher-end sushi place, not a cheerful Chinatown joint. Still, I'm hopeful that Hojoko and its swank new competitors will goose Bostonians to an overdue resetting of price expectations for modern Asian cuisine. Food and drink this carefully wrought in a kicky setting ain't cheap, but Hojoko demonstrates that it can be a real value. ◆

ASK CHERYL

Q: I HAVE BAGS AND DARK CIRCLES UNDER MY EYES THAT MAKE ME LOOK OLD AND TIRED. WHAT ARE MY OPTIONS?

A: Bags under the eyes are caused by pockets of fat, but are not associated with being overweight. This type of fat cannot be controlled by diet; it is a hereditary condition.

The best way to eliminate these bags is through surgery. The technical term for cosmetic eyelid surgery is blepharoplasty. After surgery you look totally natural and look like yourself, but more alert and refreshed.

This one-hour surgical procedure is an office-based procedure that is performed under local anesthetic. No anesthesia or sedation is necessary. The recovery time is around a week. During this period you will feel fine and can drive, shop, and maintain normal activities. However, there will be swelling and bruising around the eyes for a few days.

The first step is a consultation with an ophthalmic plastic surgeon, an eye surgeon who specializes in plastic surgery, such as Dr. Daniel Townsend at SkinHealth. You want to find a surgeon who has lots of experience, and Dr. Townsend has successfully performed over 19,000 of these procedures.

IN FROM THE COLD

SPIELBERG'S FACT-BASED DRAMA FRAMES THE COLD WAR THROUGH A MODERN LENS.

THIS HAS BECOME THE YEAR OF ESPIONAGE films. Guy Ritchie's breezily entertaining big-screen reimagining of The Man from U.N.C.L.E., an early-'60s-set prequel of the 1964-68 TV series, sadly came and went pretty quickly, but we'd already been treated to a wealth of wonderful spy movies in cinemas. Ritchie clearly enjoyed paying homage to James Bond just as much as Matthew Vaughn did with his comic book-spawned Kingsman: The Secret Service and Paul Feig did with his more broadly comic Spy, while Christopher McQuarrie's thrilling Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation improved upon almost everything those pictures did well, reigniting the public's passion for couch-jumping crazy Tom Cruise, who really must be insane to film his own spectacular stunts. The jury's still out on Spectre, Oscar-winning director Sam Mendes' dour-looking Bond picture that features Daniel Craig's fourth outing as 007, but it will likely have a license to kill all of its onscreen competition when it shoots into cineplexes in early November.

But before then, you can satisfy your spycraft cravings with Steven Spielberg's Bridge of Spies. A handsome dramatization of real events that took place during the late '50s and early '60s, the multiple Oscar winner's latest finds him returning to the talents of one of his (and America's) favorite leading men, Tom Hanks. For their fourth collaboration, Hanks dials down the comic instincts that defined his early career, slipping comfortably back into Jimmy Stewart's old shoes as modern cinema's everyman. He plays Cold War hero James B. Donovan, who defends himself and others armed not with a gun, but with the Constitution.

Donovan may end up in East Berlin on the titular Glienicke Bridge, but he's no spy; he's a lawyer, which comes in handy when the U.S. government arrests accused spy Rudolf Ivanovich Abel, a balding, unassuming man in horn-rimmed glasses. Donovan is tapped as the defense attorney for the "Colonel," as the federal agents call the British-born

Mind you, Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy is what shows through.

Soviet citizen during his arrest in the film's masterful prologue—a wordless sequence that makes the 54-year-old art enthusiast's guilt explicit. It tracks Abel from his Brooklyn apartment to the foot of the Brooklyn Bridge, where he sets up his easel and sits on a public bench, painting while secretly intercepting a coded message hidden inside a false nickel he retrieves from the bench's underside. It's obvious to us (but not him) that he's been tailed through New York's streets and subways by agents who nevertheless botch the bust back at his apartment when we (but not they) witness him destroying the evidence, keeping his composure as he finally adds dialogue to the scene, asking "Mind if I fetch my teeth?"

Does Donovan believe his coolly expressionless client is guilty? It doesn't matter, given the lawyer's belief that "everyone deserves a defense. Everyone matters." Nevertheless, it becomes obvious to Donovan that no one else feels this way during a pretrial meeting with Judge Mortimer Byers (Dakin Matthews), who demonstrates what little interest he has in the concept of "innocent until proven guilty" as it relates to Abel.

What's more, Donovan understands what will happen to his reputation when he defends one of the most hated men in the country, despite the protestations of his wife, Mary (Amy Ryan, who's unfortunately given very little to do). "Everyone will hate me," he realizes, "but at least I'll lose." Perhaps Donovan has a touch of that Hanks humor, after all.

Then again, maybe much of the understated humor in the film—from the snappy patter to the enjoyably eccentric characters Donovan encounters once he's recruited by CIA director Allen Dulles (Peter McRobbie) to arrange a spy exchange—comes from a script that is credited to Joel and Ethan Coen, working from an earlier draft by Matt Charman. That's right, the Coen brothers.

Mind you, Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy is what shows through, so if you're hoping for ironic snark, be aware that this is no Inside Llewyn Davis, even if the cold, snowy palette of the Coens' most recent masterpiece pops up in an East Berlin that's so desaturated it's almost rendered in black and white, courtesy of Spielberg's longtime cinematographer, Janusz Kaminski.

Speaking of frequent collaborators, this is the first Spielberg film since 1985's The Color Purple that hasn't been scored by John Williams, who backed out due to health issues. Nevertheless, composer Thomas Newman does his best to emulate Williams' playbook on at least half the cues. One such piece (reliant on a Lincoln-like arrangement of strings and horns) is used in a sequence that cross-cuts between Jim arguing Abel's appeal before the Supreme Court and a U-2 spy plane mission that ends abruptly with pilot Francis Gary Powers (Austin Stowell) being shot down over Russia.

The trade that Donovan is tasked with is an even swap: Abel for Powers. But when he learns that innocent American student Frederic Pryor (Will Rogers) is also being held in East Berlin, our hero hopes to negotiate the release of both Powers and Pryor, despite the U.S. government's lack of concern for the student. To them, he's a nobody—but to Donovan, every American deserves freedom. Bridge of Spies may be set during the height of the Cold War, but Spielberg's subtext is progressively modern; freedom isn't truly free if you value national security and state secrets over our Constitution. ◆

TIME KEEPER

RIHANNA'S ONE-TIME DUET PARTNER PLOTS HIS OWN ASCENT AS A DYNAMIC SINGER

MIKKY EKKO ENJOYED A JUMP-START on mainstream-pop exposure when he sang a duet with Rihanna on her video-driven 2012 single "Stay," a song that Ekko cowrote with Lana Del Rey associate Justin Parker. Rihanna even performed the hit at the 2013 Grammys, where Ekko emerged from the shadows to join in. Then he practically returned to the shadows to complete his debut album.

"It was an incredible opportunity to collaborate," Ekko says of Rihanna recording his song and sharing a Grammy moment. But the Nashville-based singer wasn't in any rush to finish his major-label debut, despite industry advisers who urged him to jump on that interest and momentum. He finally released Time in January.

"I don't give a shit about fame, but I do give a shit about my art and reaching people," Ekko, 30, says from an LA tour stop. "I'm excitable, but I'm also really stubborn... It made things a little confusing for a while, and I had to question whether people were there to help me continue to grow as an artist or to make sure they don't lose their jobs for [not] capitalizing on a particular moment."

Ekko didn't include "Stay" on his own album, though he's likely to sing the song on Oct. 22 when he hits Brighton Music Hall. "That was such a massive song that I needed time for it to simmer down, because it's not the kind of song that defines the album I made," he says. "You want people to have a clear picture."

"I'm excitable, but I'm also really stubborn... It made things a little confusing for a while."

For Ekko, that picture's more like a kaleidoscope, given his slick, eclectic mix of pop, R&B and hip-hop. For Time, he enlisted coproducers from OneRepublic's kindred singer Ryan Tedder to hip-hop maverick Clams Casino to TV on the Radio programmer David Sitek. The album's polished hodgepodge spans the bubbly pop pulse of "Smile," the slinky R&B throb of "U," the slashing rock of "Riot" and the acoustic, string-sweetened buildup of the title track before Ekko drops closer to "Stay" terrain in hip-hop piano ballads "Mourning Doves" and "Comatose."

The thread that ties it all together is his highly dramatic, melismatic voice, which suggests Jeff Buckley in more of an R&B context. "It never gets any Auto-Tune, and I'm very particular how it's treated," Ekko says. In addition to Buckley, the singer cites other rock influences like Radiohead, Nirvana, Björk and Animal Collective as well as R&B/soul greats Stevie Wonder and Brian McKnight. Born John Stephen Sudduth in Louisiana, Mikky Ekko (a name he adopted for its phonetic simplicity) also grew up singing in church, since his father was a preacher. "In a lot of my songs," he says, "there's a reverence and a desire for connection."

There's also an underlying darkness to both his music and his lyrics about romantic struggle. "I'm desperate to find places I've never been," he says, "whether that means finding places sonically or aesthetically that other people have created—and learning about those—or pushing myself to the brink of an emotional state to get to that place."

One thing he hasn't discovered: How Rihanna actually heard his big song. "I was in London working on a production and got a phone call saying, 'Hey, Rihanna wants "Stay" for her album,' and I was so surprised that I hung up and just went back to sleep because I thought it was a joke at first," he says. "It was a pretty intense time in general, knowing that magic can happen."

And if magic now happens on a smaller scale, that's OK with Ekko. "What's most exciting to me now is a lot of the people who are coming to the shows are really people who support the album and where I'm headed as an artist," says the lanky, curly-coiffed singer, who's fronting a live band that features electric guitar, a keyboard and synthesizer and electro-acoustic drums. "I stuck to my guns." ◆

MIKKY EKKO plays Brighton Music Hall on Oct. 22.

ACUTE ACCENT

VIRAL VIDEO STAR "BOSTON FISH GUY" HAS ME LONGING TO DROP MY R'S ONCE MORE

When I was in high school, deep in Maine, I harbored an abiding belief that I had no accent. A lot of those other kids, hoo, they had friggin' wicked accents, but not me. I figured I sounded like a Midwestern news anchor. One of my friends and I even started a Maine dictionary to catalog and define the unintelligible dialect of our classmates. "'Magin," meant "Yes, I would agree with that statement," while "I'mma guzzle some pounders and get right sideways" translated as "I intend to drink 16-ounce Anheuser-Busch beverages until I am intoxicated." Implicit in our goofing was the belief that of course we didn't talk like that.

But one day I brought a video camera to chronicle our school's unfortunately named Senior Slave Day, when underclass students would pay to make seniors do their bidding. In the case of my friend Josh, that meant wearing a dress all day. I captured that outfit on video while Josh threatened to kick my ass. The tape went in a box and was forgotten for about 20 years until I decided to digitize it for posterity.

When I opened the .mov file on my computer, there was Josh wearing the dress, hiding his face and threatening to administer a beatdown, just as I remembered. And there was my voice, from behind the camera, declaring, "I don't know how fast you can run in that dress." Or at least, that's what I thought I said at the time. What it actually sounds like now is "Ahnt newha faas yuginrhunin thaa draas." Well, jesum crow: I had a Maine accent. And not a mild one, either.

Initially, I was embarrassed at this revelation. Some part of my self-image rests on the premise that I've always pronounced my R's. And yet, here was clear evidence that I sounded about as intelligible as Fred Gwynne, aka Herman Munster, in Pet Sematary. Nice dress, Jaaash. And stay away from those old Micmac burial grounds!

Apparently I lost my accent in college, although I didn't make any conscious effort to do so—because, of course, I didn't think I had one in the first place. Other kids, though, underwent purposeful accent-ectomies. My friend Chris went to Boston College High School in Dorchester, and he arrived at college freshman year sounding like he could've been Mark Wahlberg's cellmate on Deer Island. He quickly decided to scrub his accent. "I realized," he said, "that when you first meet people, a Massachusetts accent doesn't make you sound like the smartest guy in the world." He's a doctor now, so I think it would've been great if he'd kept his accent: "Nahhhse, pass me them syringes. This dude's got a wicked friggin' hematomer."

The Boston accent's had a lot of national press lately, courtesy of both Black Mass and one Michael Bergin, better known as the Boston Fish Guy. I feel a certain kinship with Bergin because a couple of years ago, out on my boat, we got an up-close visit from a great white shark. I, too, shot a video, but before posting it on YouTube I erased the audio track. Why? Because we all sounded like the Boston Fish Guy, profanely trying to suss out what we were looking at, but with an added element of total pants-wetting cowardice. I just cued up the unedited version to see if it's as bad as I remember, and in fact it's worse. "That's not a whale," I say, before my nephew Brian blurts, "Dude, that's a shark! Holy shit! Should we get the fuck out of here?" He's not even from Boston, but confronting a mythic leviathan in Massachusetts waters obviously prompts a certain type of reaction, including constant profanity and an overreliance on the word "dude."

While I never went out of my way to eradicate my accent, I now sort of wish I had it back.

While I never went out of my way to eradicate my accent, I now sort of wish I had it back. Or at least, it'd be nice to summon it for certain occasions. A couple months ago I went to my high-school reunion, and I longed to drop back into the local dialect. But I can't do it anymore. I've been gone too long. If I even tried, I'd sound like Herman Munster imitating Tim Sample. I can imitate the economy of jaw motion, the tetanus-afflicted ventriloquism of Maine diction, but the words don't come out right. Or wrong, depending on your point of view. I'd have to spend a lot of time guzzling pounders in New Harbor before I sounded like anything other than an imposter.

In ruminating on the value of an accent, I decided to email the Fish Guy himself to ask if he'd ever thought about trying to get rid of his accent. Bergin replied, "Why would I want to do something dumb like that, man? I'm from the streets, kid. Good luck tryin' to get that out of me." 'Magin. ◆

ACTING YOUR AGE

SOUND ADVICE ON FEELING OUTDATED, FISHING FOR INVITES AND OFFICE FLINGS

JOHN D. SPOONER IS AN INVESTMENT ADVISER, author and novelist. His most recent book is No One Ever Told Us That: Money and Life Lessons for Young Adults. Here, he responds to queries from advice seekers of all ages. Send your conundrums to thedance@improper.com

I work in an office where most of my coworkers are a lot younger than me. On occasion, we grab drinks after work. It's a lot of fun, but I'm constantly getting teased for my seniority. I recently tried to cover up some of my gray hairs, but it ended in total embarrassment. I feel like I'm becoming somewhat of a joke to them. I really wish there were men my age that I could relate to, but I still want to be friendly with my coworkers. What should I do? You have something few of your younger friends have—years of experience—and you can do everyone a favor by turning your age into an advantage. There's a reason the very first chapter in my new book is called "Take the Pro to Lunch." Counseling so many millennials, I find that they love stories of the past that reveal how business was done before the last five years. The stories you tell should teach lessons about the mistakes you made, the bosses you had, the business tips that can serve them well. If you tell these tales with a sense of humor, in a self-deprecating, not preachy way, your young friends may look at you more positively. And they may take some of the wisdom that you earned the hard way, particularly because you're not their parent.

My friend runs an event-planning business and keeps promising to invite me to some of the high-profile events he plans. I can't tell if he's blowing me off, but I have yet to get an invite, though he insists it just keeps slipping his mind. How can I get into one of these events without being too overbearing on my friend? The very best way to get his attention and make sure you're on the invitation list is to buy yourself some personal notecards. Then you write your friend and say something simple like "I'm so looking forward to the kind of parties you've described to me." He can ignore emails and texts, even phone conversations. But he can't ignore a handwritten note on lovely stationery. His guilt level spikes. Then, you either get a bunch of invitations, or you get a new friend. And you'll have fine stationery as ammunition for the next friend you want to put to the test.

Recently, I started seeing a guy I met at a concert. We started talking, and he told me that he is in his own band. I was impressed, and we started dating soon after. However, my friends to whom I have introduced him think that he is a complete burnout and lacks ambition, but I find him fun and exciting. Even my mother is worried about me now because he's not on a traditional career path. Should I heed their advice or go with my heart? Well, in my view, you're going with a lot more than your heart in this deal. "Fun and exciting" are things worth experiencing, particularly when you're young. You should also know that there are people in your life who do not want you to have "fun and exciting" for all kinds of reasons. Some of them might wish that they had it.

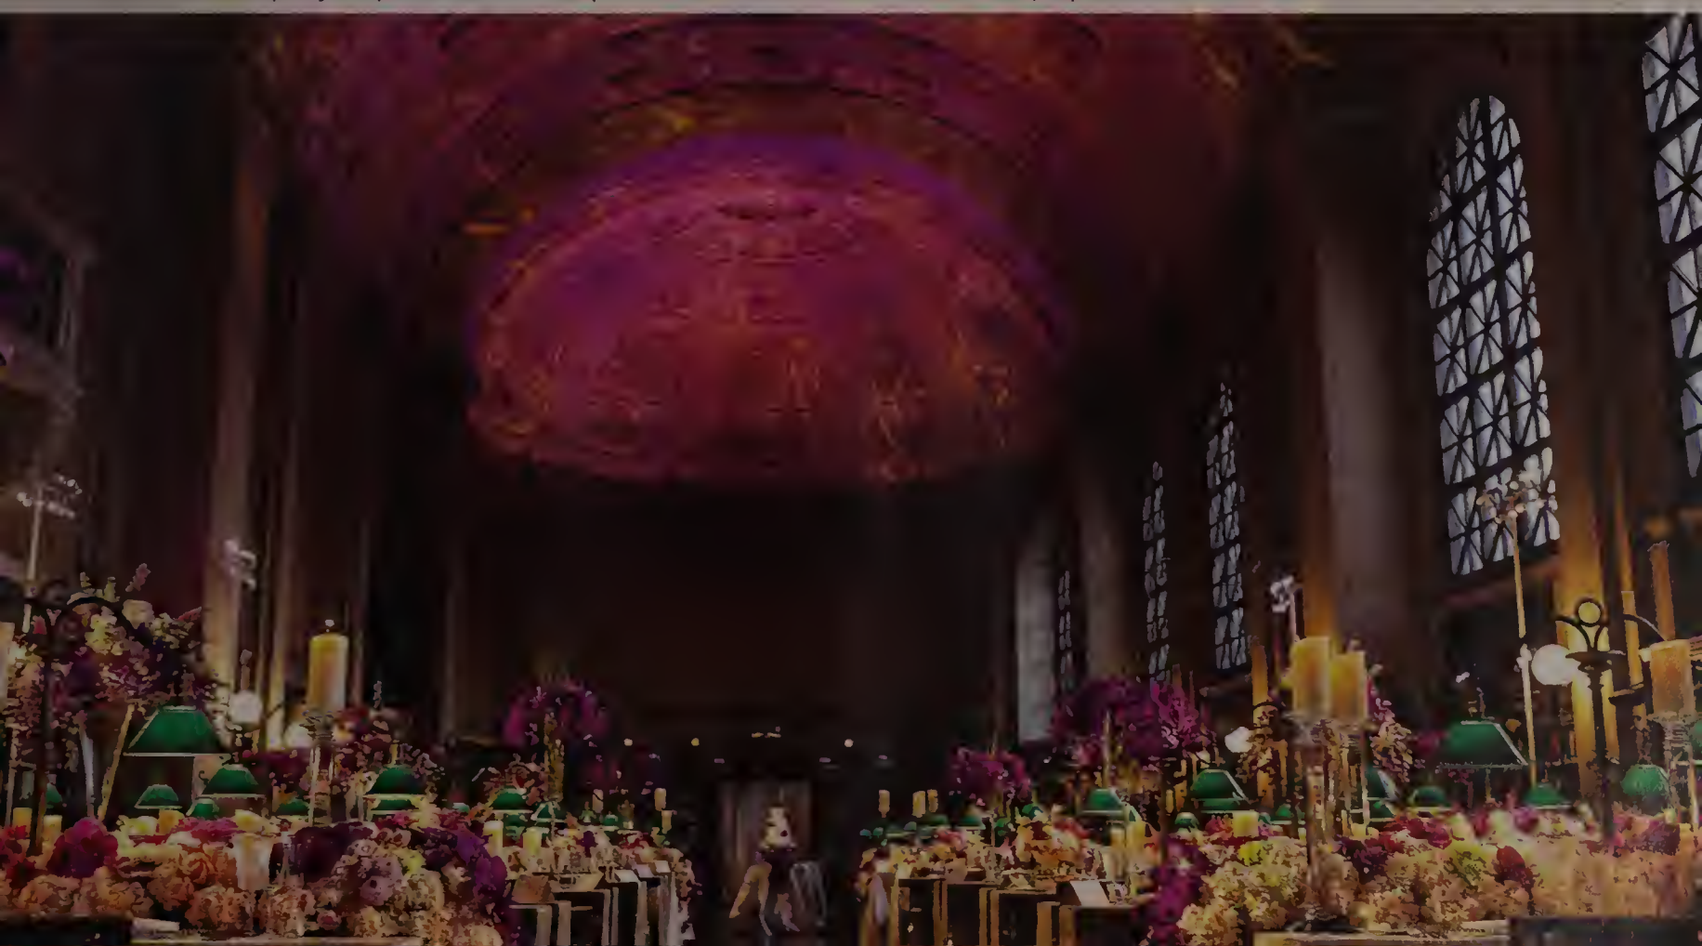
But I'll let you in on a little secret that perhaps you might know by now: Musicians are bad bets for long-term relationships. So are most creative people—actors, writers, painters. Those professions are often too tough to conquer... and the participants may be way too invested in their own dreams to take care of you in the ways you want to be cared about.

So enjoy the fling, or the romance. You can always lead with your heart. As long as you end up relying on your brain more than anything else.

If you tell these tales with a sense of humor... your young friends may look at you more positively.

I started a great new job recently and made a big move from the suburbs to the city. One of my coworkers and I have begun spending more time together during work. He will come over to my desk and chat with me, but nothing beyond that. However, yesterday, he asked me if I wanted to grab coffee with him before work. I don't want an office fling to distract me from my new job, but I am interested in him. Even worse, I cannot tell if this is a date or just a friendly gesture. What is the proper etiquette in this situation? It's not quite a friendly gesture, and it isn't a date. So treat it as a "friendly gesture," but know that your coworker likely is interested in you. Coffee will make it easy to find out about his status: single, or married, or "other."

As an insecure person, I personally hate the idea of coffee. Intentions are clearer over cocktails and dinner, and there's no pressure to rush back to work. As for the concept of an office fling, in my many years of observing work-time romance, I've found it is almost always a terrible idea. A short-term affair isn't worth the trouble. ◆



OLD SAGE: The good thing about having much younger coworkers is that you're likely wise beyond their years

BIG SELLER

THE REAL ESTATE BIGWIG DISHES ON TRICKS OF THE TRADE, HIS ACTING CAREER AND TAYLOR SWIFT.

STAR OF BRAVO REALITY SERIES MILLION DOLLAR Listing New York Ryan Serhant, 31, was raised in Topsfield and attended the Pingree School before studying theater and English literature at Hamilton College. After graduating, he moved to New York to pursue a career in acting, and he landed the role of Evan Walsh on As the World Turns in 2007. He then got into the real estate business and now works for Nest Seekers International; his team came in at No. 1 in New York on REAL Trends' 2015 national sales rankings. He recently played a hedge-fund manager in Noah Baumbach's film While We're Young, and he's appeared in real estate segments on CNN, CNBC, Fox, NBC, ABC and CBS. He lives with his fiancee in Manhattan.

JONATHAN SOROFF: Anyone ever mistake you for Ryan Seacrest?
RYAN SERHANT: Every single day. That's why I'm sure to end every conversation by saying "Seacrest out."

So is real estate really all about location, location, location? Yes, absolutely. There's no question.

One trick to help a property sell quickly? Have it be beautiful. You'd be amazed by how many people try to sell a property when it looks gross.

One thing that adds value to a property that people don't realize? White paint. I can't say it enough.

Biggest mistake most sellers make? Not using Ryan Serhant as their broker.

How about buyers? Not using Ryan Serhant as their broker.

Most unreasonable request you've ever gotten from a client? It was filmed, actually, on our first season. It was to find the client an apartment for his wallaby. It is illegal to keep a wallaby as a pet in the city of New York.

Most ridiculous lengths you've ever gone to for a deal? Getting on an airplane to London to see a client and get them to sign something when they were on the fence.

Ever do a deal that you felt was a mistake afterward? No. Every deal I do is the greatest deal in the history of the world. You have to look at it that way.

Anything you regret doing in the line of duty? [Laughs.] I took my clothes off at an open house once to steal the thunder away from another broker.

What's the most expensive property you've ever sold? $37 million. But I have a listing now for close to $49 million, so if that sells, I'll be setting a new record for myself.

Is New York real estate just ridiculously overpriced? No. Parts of New York are overpriced, but on a worldwide level, New York is actually inexpensive.

Do you look at property while you're on vacation? No. It's like that classic episode of Friends where she meets a gynecologist, and he says, "You know, if you serve coffee for a living, the last thing you wanna do when you get home is look at another cup of coffee."

"Everybody at some point or some time is dealing with real estate.... Everyone wants to know where everyone else lives."

What's your favorite real estate porn? Architectural Digest.

Favorite real estate show beside your own? I don't really have time to watch TV, so I really do only watch Million Dollar Listing.

Is the real estate business intrinsically sexy? Yes. Everybody at some point or some time is dealing with real estate, whether they're buying, selling, renting, whatever, and that interplay is sexy. Everyone wants to know where everyone else lives.

Is the real estate business like show business? Yes. Very much so. The job of putting a deal together for an apartment is very similar to putting a movie together. You're creating a project, lining up investors, bringing something to the market that you hope everybody's going to want. And if it bombs, everyone is pissed off at the same time.

How much money would it take for you to do a porn movie with [Listing costar and former adult film star] Fredrik Eklund? No amount of money. Well, maybe one trillion dollars. [Laughs.]

Where is your ideal home? A penthouse apartment at the top of a skyscraper with 360-degree views of the city.

One thing anyone can do to make their place more marketable? Remove any and all clutter.

Has being on TV improved your business? Yes. Probably by 800 percent.

Best place to invest in real estate? The East Village.

Are looks important in your business? Not as important as knowledge. There are some very, very unattractive brokers who are very smart and knowledgeable about the market, and they do just fine.

Any more acting roles lined up after While We're Young? Yes. I did a guest spot on that show The Mysteries of Laura with Debra Messing. Then there are two other movies that I'm not allowed to discuss quite yet.

Is Noah Baumbach a genius? Yes. Without a doubt.

Best part of doing a soap opera? Being paid to be overly dramatic.

Worst? So much memorizing.

Best address in New York? Right now? 220 Central Park South.

Best address in Boston? I would say somewhere in the Back Bay area—the neighborhood is stunning, especially when the seasons are changing. The Back Bay is elegant, in a wonderful location, and it reminds me of New York's Upper East Side.

Hottest amenity in real estate right now? A DJ room. Kids are getting into being DJs now the way we played video games as kids.

If you could sell any celebrity a home, who would it be and why? Taylor Swift and how could you even ask me why?! It's T. Swift!

Fakest part of reality TV? The tears. ◆

MARCUS SMART

Smart sheds the rookie label this season, but he's expected to take on a new label: starting point guard. The Celtics have historically had great point guards, and the 21-year-old will now have a chance to join those ranks and showcase his All-Star potential. There are almost no questions about his defense, but it's the addition of ball-handling duties that provides the most intrigue—and an opportunity for Smart to break out.

DAVID KREJCI

As the league's top postseason producer during the Bruins' two runs to the Stanley Cup Finals, Krejci ups his game when it matters most. But thanks to an injury-filled year, he never got that chance in 2015 as the Bruins missed the playoffs for the first time since 2007. The center will be asked to replicate his playoff magic during the regular season so that the Bruins don't go home in April once again.

Prior to last season and going back before the Obama administration, Lee had mostly been a starter. He made his bones with the New York Knicks before landing a six-year, $80 million deal with the Golden State Warriors in 2010. But the two-time All-Star took a bench role last season during the Warriors' championship run. Traded to Boston during the offseason, the 32-year-old forward might not always crack the starting lineup, but he should get a chance to reverse last season's statistical slide.

The team's top goal scorer last season was also frequently the first to put the B's on the scoreboard, and he's no stranger to coming through when the stakes are high, with a bevy of shorthanded goals and overtime winners. But his key for the upcoming season is consistency. If Marchand can finish all of his opportunities—even outside clutch situations—he'll cement himself as a much-needed offensive leader on a team that's sometimes struggled to score.

JIMMY HAYES

The Dorchester native's return to Boston is all most fans can talk about. But if they just focus on his hometown, they're missing the whole story. Hayes is coming off a career-high 35 points with the Florida Panthers. The 6-foot-5-inch BC alum often used his large frame to force the action in front of the net, racking up a number of goals near the crease. He doesn't necessarily need to use his size to level every opponent he sees, but if he can use it to score, he'll stay in the headlines for more than his local ties. ·

The longest-tenured Celtics player broke free of the injury-prone label last season and proved his steady offensive game is no fluke But it's the 24-year-old's defensive prowess that has stood out to most observers—except for the voters of the All-Defensive team, who snubbed him last season Bradley was always a menace for opponents, so imagine how good he can be when he's got a chip on his shoulder

MATT BELESKEY

The Bruins' priciest acquisition this summer finished last season in Anaheim with a slew of career-high stats. Out of his 22 goals, eight were game winners, and he notched an additional eight scores in 16 postseason games—a repeat performance would contribute to a successful offense. Plus, if the 27-year-old can build on last season's statistical surge, the hardnosed left winger might just do the impossible: make Bruins fans forget about the beloved Milan Lucic.

JAE CROWDER

During his time in Boston last season, Crowder stood out on the court—and not because of his thick ponytail of dreadlocks. His toughness made him an instant fan favorite (he's just as intense on Twitter, posting in all caps), and his ability to play and defend multiple positions endeared the 6-foot-6-inch forward to the coaches despite his dip in shooting efficiency. With a new five-year, $35-million contract, he'll get plenty of opportunities to further unlock his offensive potential.

The littlest guy on the team made the biggest impact on the Celtics offense after he was traded to Boston in February. Thomas led the Celtics in scoring during his 21-game stint, but he's not content with piling up stats. With bravado to match his boxing buddy Floyd Mayweather, the 26-year-old says he wants to make his first All-Star team this season. That goal might be on the money if he ups his defense, thus earning enough playing time to show off his All-Star-worthy offense.

The defenseman now has two full seasons under his belt, but a decade of experience separates him from the team's top blue-liners, Dennis Seidenberg and Zdeno Chara. With injuries a concern for those two, the 24-year-old needs to shed his reputation as an offensive-minded defenseman and become more of a two-way player. While his 39 points are tops among returning Bruins defensemen, he's going to be tasked with proving he can shut down opponents as well.

Indie comics draw a crowd.

COMIC BOOK connoisseurship is no longer a niche subculture, thanks in part to blockbuster movies and the growing popularity of events such as Comic Con. Indie comics may not have as many fanboys and girls, but they'll get their moment in the spotlight at the Massachusetts Independent Comics Expo (MICE), an annual festival dedicated to Boston-area artists and writers of the genre. MICE focuses on the art of creating comics, rather than on celebrity appearances or memorabilia, but that's not to say it's only for industry pros. Expect a bevy of exhibits, lectures, demos, workshops and even an "Iron Cartoonist" showdown when the free fest takes over Lesley's University Hall on Oct. 17-18. / Alexandra Cavallo

LAUGH LINES Knock, knock. Who's there? Whoever I decide to be today! That's the punch line of Polish Joke, playwright David Ives' irreverent, largely autobiographical sendup of ethnic stereotypes and the American dedication to connecting with one's roots. In the Titanic Theatre Company production, the Polish-American Jasiu decides he doesn't care for his own roots and embarks on a journey to invent some new ones, trying a series of ethnicities, heritages and identities—each more improbable than the last. The comedic but emotionally charged play cracks wise through Oct. 18 at Central Square Theater. / Alexandra Cavallo

IN THE DOG HOUSE Ron "Stray Dog" Hall had a small role in Debra Granik's Oscar-nominated 2010 film Winter's Bone. Now the tattooed biker is the subject of Stray Dog, the Cambridge-born director's first documentary, an affecting portrait of a man struggling with nightmarish memories of Vietnam while going to great lengths to help his family and fellow veterans. From fixing the water-damaged floor of a grieving military mother to building a rocking horse for his own great-grandson, Hall never stops serving, despite the fact he took his uniform off years ago. Take a ride to the Brattle Theatre to catch the area premiere on Oct. 23-25. Ariana Colozzo

99 Homes ★★★1/2 You know there's something wrong when a real estate broker packs a gun. But then, Ramin Bahrani's sixth feature is set in 2010, not long after the housing market implosion of 2008, when brokers like Rick Carver (Michael Shannon) preyed on the helpless, such as Dennis Nash (Andrew Garfield), an honest construction worker in Florida who's unable to save his family home from sudden foreclosure. Out of work and luck, Dennis swallows his pride to try to get himself, his mother (Laura Dern) and his son (Noah Lomax) out of the motel where they and dozens of others in their situation have been forced to live. Making a Mephistophelean bargain, Dennis begins working for Rick, the man who kicked him out of his house. "Don't get emotional about real estate," the shark tells his protege, as Dennis all too quickly begins his transformation from prey to predator, and his slide into moral decay. To Rick, wealth equals self-respect, but Dennis is about to lose his, and the results are reminiscent of 2003's Crimson Gold, Jafar Panahi's humanist masterpiece about a good person driven to do bad things. You can see the pain in Garfield's performance, but it's Shannon who steals the film just as easily as Rick seizes homes. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Black Mass ★★ If there's one thing journeyman director Scott Cooper (Crazy Heart) gets right in this adaptation of former Boston Globe reporters Dick Lehr and Gerard O'Neill's nonfiction best-seller, it's the puggish, lived-in faces of his supporting cast—like the murderous members of James "Whitey" Bulger's notorious Winter Hill Gang, Rory Cochrane's Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and Jesse Plemons' Kevin Weeks. Alas, Mark Mallouk and Jez Butterworth's screenplay uses their first-person confessions as a framing device, only to drop it just as nonchalantly as Cooper drops Catherine Greig—Sienna Miller was filmed playing Whitey's girlfriend, but she's nowhere onscreen, one of many reasons the movie fails to find the man behind the mobster. Or rather, the man behind the makeup: As Bulger, Johnny Depp never cracks that devilish Whitey smile, probably because he's buried his matinee-idol looks under an immobile mound of prosthetics. And ice-blue contacts make him look more dead than alive—which also describes the film as a whole. It could have been a potent exploration of brotherhood, both literal and figurative (with Benedict Cumberbatch as Billy Bulger and Joel Edgerton as Whitey's townie FBI protector, John Connolly). Instead, Black Mass becomes a movie focused on bullet points rather than hits, chronological reporting lacking any depth or authorial control. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Goodnight Mommy (Ich seh, Ich seh) ★★★ Nine-year-old twins Lukas and Elias (Lukas and Elias Schwarz) sit with their mother (Susanne Wuest), a slinky Austrian TV host who's been rendered unrecognizable by layers of bandages after a hospital stay. The three are playing a game of "Who Am I?"—where the players must ask "yes" or "no" questions to guess what's written on the notes affixed to their foreheads. It should be relatively easy for her to realize the word reveals her actual identity: "Mama." Strangely, she can't quite recognize herself in the clues...and as the days go by, even the boys have trouble believing that this woman is truly their mother. Why, for example, is this once-sweet woman refusing to even acknowledge the presence of one son, while favoring the other to a suffocating degree? Set within a secluded modern country home surrounded by endless trees, exquisitely captured on 35mm film by cinematographer Martin Gschlacht (Revanche), this art-house chiller with a torture-porn heart may expose its secret early to alert viewers, but suspense remains through the final frames. (At Kendall Square and Somerville.)

Grandma ★★★1/2 Unseen in a lead film role since Big Business in 1988, Lily Tomlin's enjoying one hell of a year. First, there was her hit Netflix series, Grace and Frankie. Now, the 76-year-old actress and comedian stars in this modest and unexpectedly emotional little gem as Elle, a poet who hasn't published in decades. Elle currently has about $40 to her name, so what's she to do when her granddaughter Sage (Julia Garner) shows up unannounced needing $630 before sundown? Why, set off on an 8-hour journey in her antique Dodge Royal as the two drop in on Cam (Nat Wolff), Sage's deadbeat boyfriend and part of the reason for her troubles. They also visit a couple of Elle's old friends (played by Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox and the late Elizabeth Peña), but it's the encounters with two of Elle's exes that gives the movie much of its heft. Sam Elliott is devastating as Karl, the man she wronged decades before, while Judy Greer—playing Olivia, the younger woman Elle's recently broken up with—is finally given a role to shine in after playing the token mom in three of this summer's blockbusters. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Intern ★★★1/2 If there's something to be gleaned from movies like The Martian and this wonderful new comedy from writer/director Nancy Meyers (Something's Gotta Give), it's that films don't need villains to remain interesting. And the characters within don't need to struggle to be better people when they're pretty damn great to begin with. I'm not sure why many people don't seem to like Anne Hathaway, but as Jules Ostin, the successful, overwhelmed owner of an online fashion site, she's as good as ever. The real surprise here is Robert De Niro, who's been phoning it in for at least 15 years now. As Ben Whittaker, a 70-year-old widower who's become restless in retirement, he anchors the film with a subtle performance, and it's terrific to see him actually acting again. When Ben sees an ad looking for a "senior intern," the career company man jumps at the opportunity to join Jules' operation. The 30-something CEO doesn't want anything to do with this nattily dressed geezer at first, but he gradually, organically becomes a friend and confidante. Sure, there are brief misunderstandings between the two, but that's it for conflict. What remains is the radical idea of spending time with good people. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Learning to Drive ★★1/2 Patricia Clarkson is a treasure, but like most actresses of a certain age in Hollywood, she's in need of better scripts. Not that Isabel Coixet's comedy/drama is a bad film—it's better than most pictures that opened in August—but its story of a middle-aged Manhattan book critic taking lessons from a Sikh instructor drives down a very predictable path. Clarkson is Wendy, whose husband of 21 years (Jake Weber) has just left her. Deciding to spend more time with her daughter Tasha (Grace Gummer) in Vermont, Wendy must get a car, but first she needs a license, which is where the lessons with Darwan (Ben Kingsley) come in. He's a cabbie, an American citizen originally from India, and he's being pushed into an arranged marriage. Sarah Kernochan's stagey script is all very sitcomy, but Clarkson and Kingsley (who appeared together in Coixet's Elegy in 2008) make the situations go down easy as the two help each other to get back on the sometimes-bumpy road of life. (At West Newton.)

The Martian ★★★★ Raise your hand if you've heard this one before: Matt Damon plays an astronaut who's stranded alone on an inhospitable planet, and he's willing to do just about anything to get back home to Earth. OK, put your hand down, because The Martian isn't Interstellar. It's better. In Ridley Scott's realistically science-minded triumph, the charming actor plays Mark Watney, who's abandoned and left for dead during a mission on Mars. A splendid adaptation of Andy Weir's speculative-fiction novel, this 3-D marvel focuses on Mark's efforts to stay alive. It will take four years for a rescue mission to reach him, and even with rationing, his food supply will only last a year. "Luckily, I'm a botanist," Mark says during one of his many video log entries, a device that allows the innately likable Damon to address the audience directly through much of the film; we believe in Mark as he concludes, "I'm gonna have to science the shit out of this." Does he ever. But rather than play things for suspense, as Alfonso Cuarón did in 2013's Gravity, the 77-year-old Scott presents his picture as a paean to the enduring spirit of man's ingenuity against overwhelming odds. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Sicario ★★★ French-Canadian director Denis Villeneuve is making quite the career out of creating a sense of creeping dread. Prisoners, his bleak revenge drama from 2013, didn't quite work, but there was an intensity to the performances that was matched by the work of cinematographer Roger Deakins and composer Jóhann Jóhannsson. Both rejoin Villeneuve on his latest movie, a moderately more successful vigilante film that hides the dark heart of a thriller. Set at the lawless border that separates the U.S. from Mexico, this picture won't do much to sway Donald Trump's mind about the "rapists." Then again, the shadowy people working for unidentified U.S. agencies in this bleak look at the War on Drugs won't give you much faith in our own motivations or moral high ground, a lesson that's learned the hard way by idealistic federal agent Kate Macer (Emily Blunt), who's recruited by flip-flop-wearing Matt Graver (Josh Brolin), a government task force official who tells her to observe as they "shake the trees and create chaos." Watching from the shadows is Benicio Del Toro's Alejandro, a consultant with a murky past and a personal agenda. Be prepared to take a shower when it's over. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Straight Outta Compton ★★★ F. Gary Gray's film burned up the box office, and why not? His chronicle of the five young men who rose above their upbringing in Compton, California, begins in 1987, but it captures the zeitgeist of the Black Lives Matter movement: The police who constantly drive through the frame, threatening to keep our young black heroes in their place, serves to remind us that as much as some things change, most things painfully remain the same. The cast is uniformly terrific in this portrayal of the rise of subversive "gangsta rap" group N.W.A.—made up of Ice Cube (O'Shea Jackson Jr., the real Ice Cube's son), Dr. Dre (Corey Hawkins), Eazy-E (Jason Mitchell), DJ Yella (Neil Brown Jr.) and MC Ren (Aldis Hodge)—who stand up to authority by creating angry anthems such as "Fuck tha Police," which Gray (Ice Cube's director in 1995's Friday) and his writers stage here as a direct response to the group nearly being arrested outside their recording studio simply for being black in the wrong place. Sure, the movie is hagiographic and overstuffed, but like the group, it's electric and not easily silenced. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Visit ★1/2 Some have hailed this movie as a return to form for writer/director M. Night Shyamalan, and he does return to his hoary old device of building a story backward from a late-movie revelation. But the real twist is that the man Newsweek once proclaimed "the next Spielberg" has simply given up. Working for Jason Blum, producer of the budget-rate Paranormal Activity pictures, Shyamalan finally forgoes his sense of craft, employing a variation on the "found footage" gimmick of those cheapies and the granddaddy of the genre, The Blair Witch Project, which just happened to open the week before his breakout success, 1999's The Sixth Sense. (You're a bit late to the party, M.) Nevertheless, Shyamalan does display his Spielberg-like gift for pulling strong performances out of young actors. Fifteen-year-old Becca and her younger brother, Tyler (Australian talents Olivia DeJonge and Ed Oxenbould), are sent by their single mom (Kathryn Hahn) to the remote Pennsylvania farm of the increasingly odd grandparents they've never met (Deanna Dunagan and Peter McRobbie). Budding filmmaker Becca and her bro document the week-long visit on video, and while they don't see dead people, they do see dirty adult diapers. We just see crap. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Walk ★★1/2 Someone's bound to take the 20-minute vertiginous sequence at the center of this latest movie from director Robert Zemeckis (Forrest Gump) and edit this titular walk into James Marsh's Oscar-winning 2008 documentary, Man on Wire. Both films focus on Philippe Petit, a Frenchman who, in 1974, dreamed of walking between the World Trade Center's twin towers on a high wire. Footage of this "artistic crime of the century" is all that's missing from Marsh's doc, which used still photos to illustrate the illegal feat. Zemeckis, who's frequently been better with technology than real people, beautifully recreates the tightrope routine in 3-D, using all of the CGI tools at his disposal. For instance, when Petit (played by Joseph Gordon-Levitt) takes a moment to lie back on the wire, a seagull flies into frame above him. It's a lovely image—and it's nearly ruined by the incessant chatter provided by Zemeckis and co-writer Christopher Browne's screenplay. Gordon-Levitt narrates most of the action in a Pepé Le Pew accent, which is matched by the unfortunately cartoonish-looking visual that bookends the film, as his Petit tells his tale from the Statue of Liberty's torch. Despite this, the movie stands as a stirring tribute to what we've lost. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

MUSIC

Edited by Sarah Hagman

JUNGLE HOOKS Glass Animals' Zaba is something of a head trip, though it's one that leads to a tropical paradise. The group recorded its 2014 debut—named after the adventure-filled children's book The Zabajaba Jungle—while holding tropics-inspired props like pineapples and Hawaiian leis. Those flourishes were the brainchild of Dave Bayley, who helms the atmospheric British pop quartet that caught the attention of mega-producer Paul Epworth (who's worked with the likes of Bloc Party, Coldplay and Adele). Beyond the bird calls and rustle of palm trees, listeners will catch hints of the frontman's neuroscience background and eclectic influences like Radiohead, Animal Collective and Dr. Dre—all adding up to the perfect escape. Go along for the ride at House of Blues on Oct. 17. / Sarah Hagman

MUSEUMS & GALLERIES

Edited by Sarah Hagman

MOTIVATIONAL PEEKING The last time someone called you a tightwad, it probably wasn't meant to be uplifting. In the Roaring '20s, it was a different story. This month, International Poster Gallery displays recently discovered motivational prints from Chicago printing firm Mather and Company, which took a page from the government's World War I poster campaign to boost workplace morale. Find slogans that once graced factory walls, like the aforementioned "Be a Tight Wad," "Hot Heads Never Do Cool Thinking," "Hoping Beats Moping" and the motto above, inspired by aviator Charles Lindbergh's pioneering 33-hour solo flight across the Atlantic. Find some encouragement at Who Said "Can't"?, on view through Nov. 15. Sarah Hagman

SUSHI ANYONE?

What's not to love about a party that starts with cocktails in a mangrove swamp? Party for a Blue Planet, a fundraiser for the New England Aquarium, featured drinks in the Tropical Gallery, strolling dinner stations around the Giant Ocean Tank and raucous partying in a tent overlooking Boston Harbor. Even the seals seemed to enjoy themselves, frolicking nonstop while guests sipped, supped and danced the night away.

Present and accounted for: blond beauty Alyson Lindsey and her suspiciously tan other half, Jeff, board chair Donna Hazard, the delightful and delovely Jane Wolfson, head honcha Nigella Hillgarth, pharma bigwig David Altshuler, affable blue blood Ogden Hunnewell, silver fox Pamela Humphrey, the delightful Michelle and Andres Vilms, investment guru Alistair Lowe, the always sparkly Mary Renner, Prince Harry look-alike Bowman Hallagan and one guest who said, "I wonder if the penguins realize they're living in waterfront property rent-free?"

However, the evening's funniest remark came when one attendee said, "I always think it's weird that they serve seafood at these things," to which an Aquarium staffer responded, "Don't worry. We count the fish afterward."

LIVING LA DOLCE VITA

Q: What's more Italian than Italian?
A: Italianissimo!, the fundraiser for Friends of the Italian Cultural Center of Boston, which was held on the banks of the Charles at the Museum of Science's Washburn Pavilion.

A Fiat Cinquecento, complete with a cardboard cutout of the Pope, blessed the proceedings as guests sipped cocktails and watched sailboats glide past. Inside a tent, meanwhile, an Italian feast was served family-style to a high-octane crowd that included Italian consul general Nicola DeSantis, gaming mogul Alberto Fornaro, token Irish chicks Margery Eagan and Emily Rooney, soignée divorcee Jan Saragoni, incorrigible scamp Tony Nunziante, nightlife kingpin Patrick Lyons and the stunning Kristina, fashion royalty Yolanda Cellucci and her handsome husband, Dan, BSO babe Dorcen Reis and former first lady Angela Menino, who gave out awards named for her late great husband.

The entire evening was molto bene, and the wine kept flowing into the wee hours, prompting one guest to say, "The best thing about Uber is that it takes away some of the stigma of getting drunk."

However, the evening's best exchange was as follows: "I might be Irish, but my dress is Armani," to which another guest responded, "I'm Italian by injection."

WHERE'S VAN MORRISON WHEN YOU NEED HIM?

It was a marvelous night for a Moondance, judging by the fact that the annual gala to support the Esplanade Association raised close to a million bucks.

The party, held beneath a tent next to the statue of Arthur Fiedler, began with cocktails served from a vintage Airstream trailer (note to self: I need one!) and continued with dinner and a live auction where one slightly inebriated guest asked, "They're auctioning off Bruins' wives?"

Prominent among the throng: blond bombshell Julia Owens, unfairly beautiful pair Liz and Peter Georgantas, Latin firecracker Yvette Lowenthal Mulderry and her handsome other half, Peter, bashful Adonis Tom Potter and his dapper husband, Dan Mathieu, the naturally carbonated Jodi Hess and her hubby, Hal, Back Bay party pair Steve and Jeryl Oristaglio, debonair developer Tony Pangaro and his stunning wife, Creelea, dazzling young things Lori and Matthew Sidman, Newbury Street royalty Judi Rotenberg and her sister, Jane Moss, the incomparable Audrey and James Foster, arts booster Dan Elias and his enchanting other half, Karen Keane, real estate magnate Christopher Egan and the lovely Jean, the effervescent Sue Brady Hartigan, ebony goddess Ingrid Calder, and so on and so forth down the line of A-listers.

For those who were still standing, there was dancing under the stars, and judging by the couple making out by the water, it was a fantabulous night to make romance 'neath the cover of September skies.

Overheard by the bar: "My husband said I had to choose between my wine glass and my auction paddle. Last year, I accidentally bought him a $10,000 watch." ◆

VERY GOOD SPORTS

CONFESSION TIME: I AM THE least sports-savvy person I know. But while I barely know a puck from a parquet, I'm still a huge fan of this issue. Maybe I was hooked by John Huet's killer portraits of Bruins and Celtics players, which turned out so well that we just had to showcase them on dual covers—something we've only done twice before in the magazine's history. Or maybe it was the accompanying profiles, which offer a little something for everyone, whether you're interested in the athletes' aims for the season ahead or (like me) would rather read about their go-to emoji and playlist faves. Then again, maybe it was Sarah Hagman's take on the arena the two teams share, or her look at the history-making National Women's Hockey League, which was founded by a Northeastern alum and boasts the Boston Pride as one of its first four teams. Or perhaps it was Matt Martinelli's chat with a beloved fixture of Celtics games, or Alexandra Cavallo's story on a locally developed fitness device already being used by NBA, NHL and Olympic athletes. Of course, there's plenty of non-sporty fun in this issue too, from Meghan Kavanaugh's Q&A with trans activist Jennifer Finney Boylan to Scott Kearnan's sneak peek at the divine design at a new fashion destination. Hope you find something to cheer for too.

BREAKING THE ICE

FEMALE PRO HOCKEY PLAYERS GET A NEW LEAGUE—AND SALARIES.

SHINING KNIGHT: Hilary Knight is hearing from fans excited for the NWHL.

Power Play

The City of Champions will have yet another team to root for come Nov. 22, when the puck drops at Boston Pride's first home match at Harvard's Bright-Landry Center. Fans can thank Northeastern grad Dani Rylan, who's spent the past year and a half putting together the National Women's Hockey League. It's the first in North America to offer health insurance, equipment and salaries, a big deal for athletes who train around nine-to-fives as teachers, nurses, financial advisers and mechanical engineers.

The dream doesn't stop there for Rylan, who also hopes NWHL players receive recognition beyond the long-awaited financial compensation, a goal Boston Pride forward and two-time Olympian Hilary Knight happens to share. "As Olympic athletes, here we are around this great stage. We're representing our country, and then it's sort of like 'poof,' " Knight says. "We've been told we're only good every four years, essentially." So it's easy to see how she didn't quite believe Rylan's concept at first. "You're sitting back thinking, 'Is this real?' because you don't have that self-belief of what value you bring to the table."

But that's all about to change—in fact, it's already starting. A couple of years ago, Knight was picking up her equipment at an airport baggage claim when a passerby felt the need to tell her she wasn't a professional athlete because she wasn't paid. This year, the scenario repeated itself, only this airport patron stopped Knight to express excitement about the new league. "It's going to put women's ice hockey on a whole new level," she says, adding it will not only develop the fan base, but also get younger girls into the sport. That's another long-term goal for Rylan, who's looking forward to a stacked draft decades from now. "Every once in a while a parent will come up to me and say, 'Thank you for giving my daughter the same opportunity [as my son].' " That, Rylan says, "makes it all worth it." / Sarah Hagman

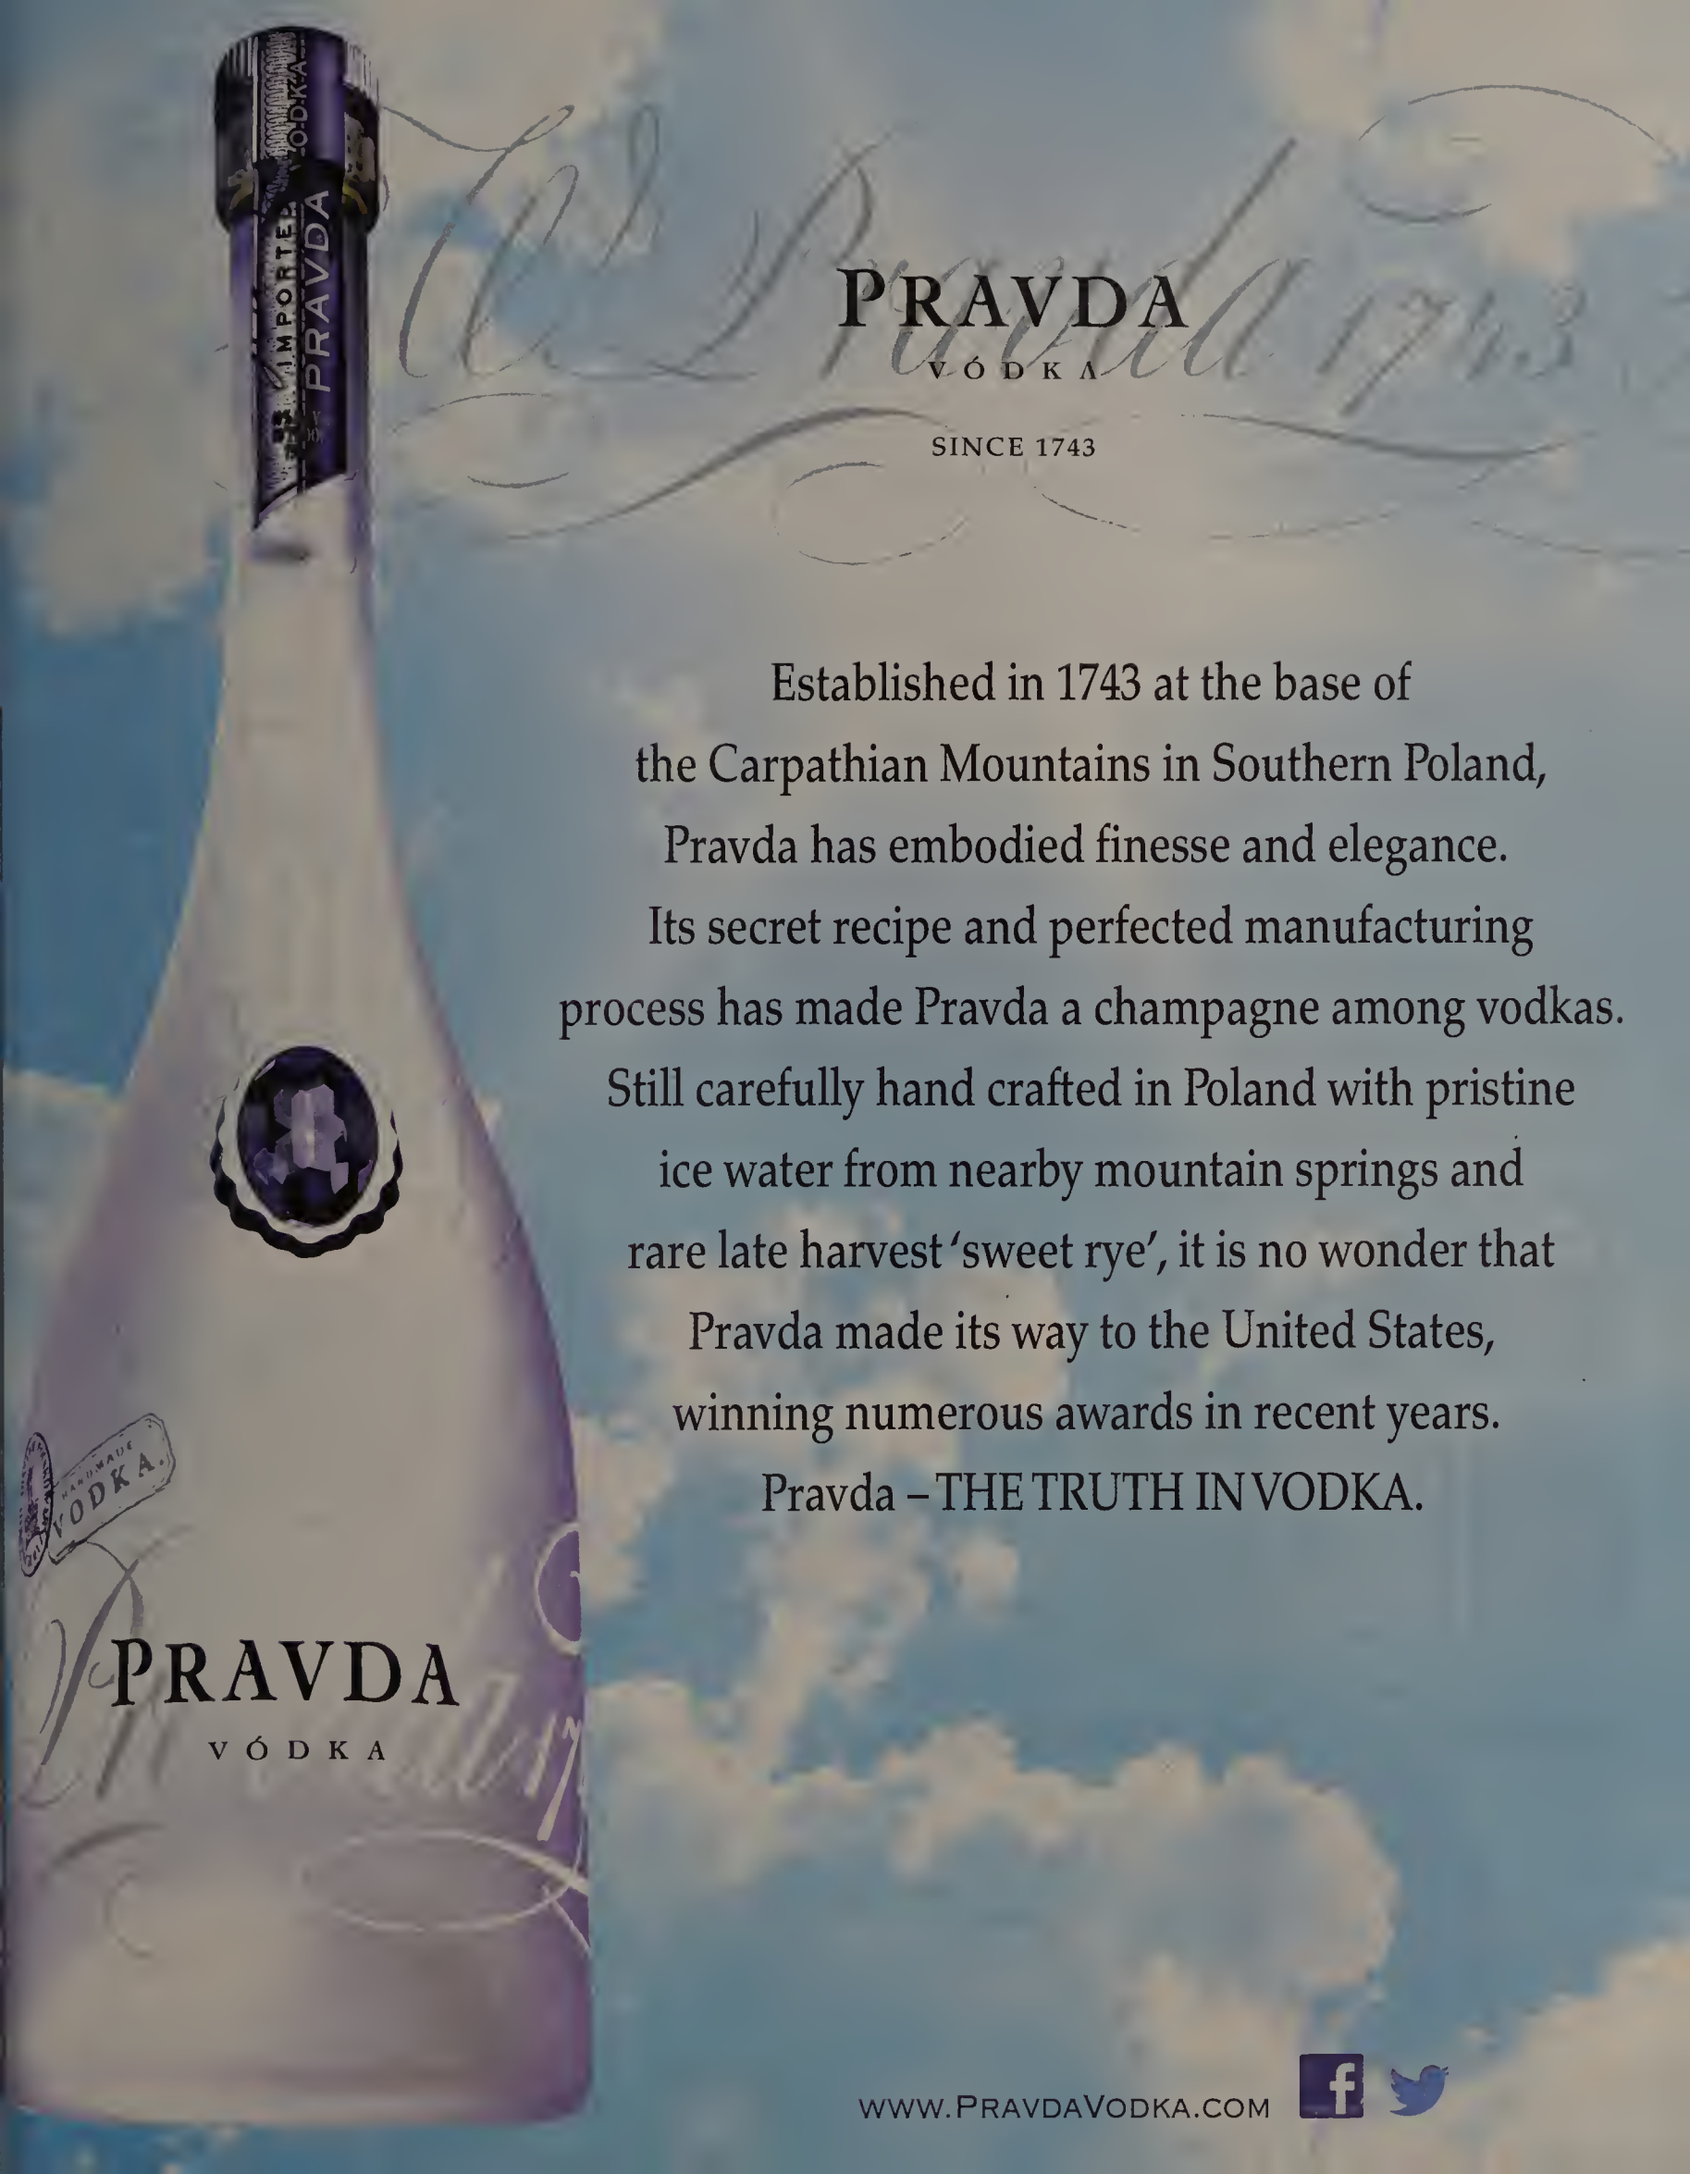
NO. 1 FAN: Carl Lenhart grew up in Indiana watching Bob Cousy and the Celtics on TV.



For Celtics fans, no home game is complete without a sighting of Carl Lenhart, 71, in his tan blazer, pounding his chest to pump up the fans. Before the season opener, he chatted about what goes into being a fan favorite. / Matt Martinelli

ON HIS FIRST JUMBOTRON SHOWING: It was not until May [2008]. I was there the whole year and hadn't been on the Jumbotron. It gave me time to think "If they ever get me on that, what am I going to do? I don't want to just be an idiot." I'd been very impressed by [Kevin Garnett] and the passion he had for the game. ... As part of his pregame routine, he comes to the crowd and does that chest bump, and I thought, "This guy is not forgetting us." And I said, "When I go on the Jumbotron, that's what I'm going to do."

ON HIS WARDROBE: I wore the jacket because it's what I had and it was warm. As it turns out, the jacket was like the color of the parquet floor. I'd say, "I look just like that floor." I also usually wear No. 34, a [Paul] Pierce jersey. ... I didn't wear the jacket for one of the games in the Finals in 2008, and boy did people get on me about that. We won the game, but if we had lost, I would've been in trouble. I thought right then, "Uh oh, I'm kind of becoming the property of the fans."

ON HIS STREET CRED: I get recognized on the street by strangers. They'll roll the window down and say, "Hey, you going to the game tonight?" Once, I was at Heathrow Airport in London, and I got recognized there.

ON HIS TIP FOR THE JUMBOTRON OPERATOR: I like it at the beginning, when I have that emotion. I'm ready to explode myself on that court. So, get me then. And then at the end, when they want the crowd to get revved up, go to me. I'm so honored when they do that

WHOOP, THERE IT IS

The newly launched WHOOP may look a bit like a Fitbit, but "it isn't a wearable or a device as much as it is an overall system," says local founder Will Ahmed, who got interested in the impact of sleep, strain and recovery on athletes while playing squash at Harvard. Now WHOOP measures those factors by collecting 150 MB of daily data on heart rate, motion, skin conductivity and other variables that can be shared with coaches and fellow athletes on a team dashboard. "Thirty percent of athletes are actually overtrained," says Ahmed, who hopes the system will help users optimize training and prevent injury. It's an idea that's clinched his company $12 million in recent funding, which will be used to target pro and college teams. But Ahmed says that eventually amateur athletes "who take fitness seriously" will be able to WHOOP their butts into shape too. / Alexandra Cavallo

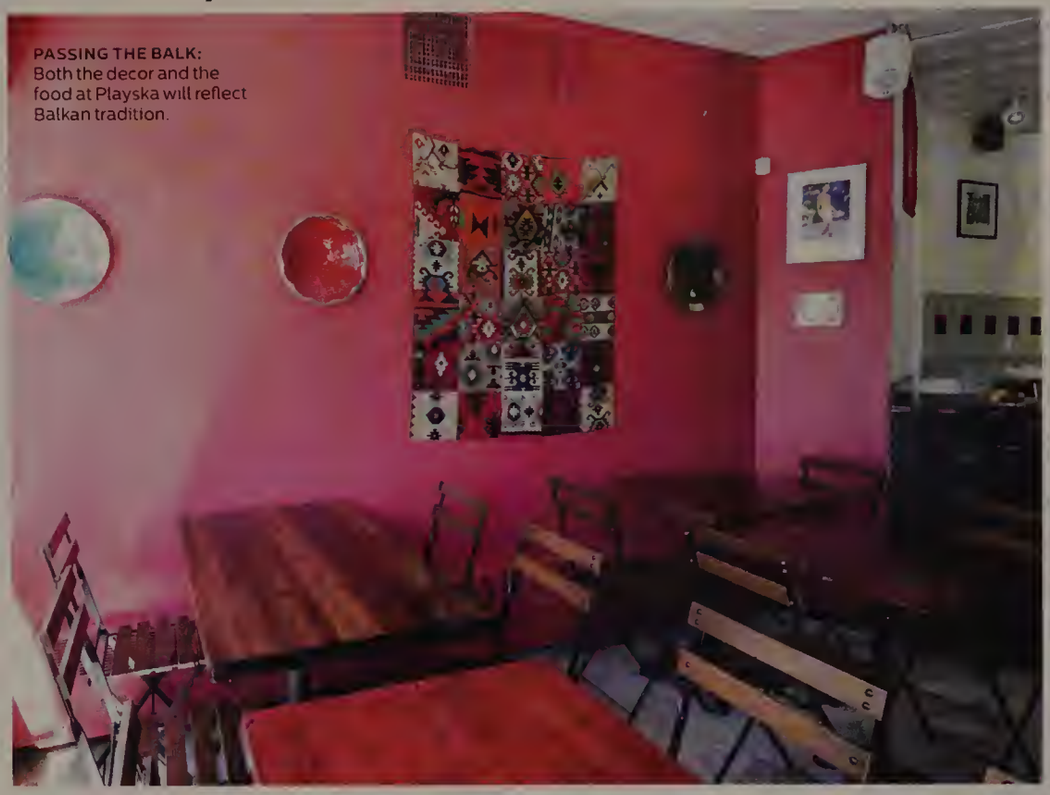
Dream Catcher®

Legendary Toasted Chestnut Liqueur

The origins of Dream Catcher, an old Gaelic recipe, started in a historic farm house with a pot still in County Cavan, Ireland.

A farmer was inspired to blend an elixir of the natural flavor of toasted chestnuts and other natural flavors with select Irish Spirits to create the superb taste of a toasted Irish Liqueur. This wonderful treasure was discovered several years ago and is now coming to the world.

The farmer claimed it was a "Dream worth catching".



Dream Catcher Hot Chestnut

Pour a shot of Dream Catcher into a brandy glass. Top with an equal part of very hot water. Savor the spectacular, warm taste of toasted chestnuts with select Irish Spirits.

TIME TO PLAY

Playska
playska.com

IT'S EASY TO FIGURE OUT WHY TIM Wiechmann's forthcoming fast-casual bakery and cafe is called Playska. That's the name of the menu's signature sandwich. But many locals may wonder: "What exactly is a playska?"

It's the type of question Wiechmann looks forward to answering often as he whips up Balkan cuisine at the Inman Square spot. "I think the food from the Balkans is awesome. It's not really popular or known about in the States," says the chef/owner of Bronwyn and T.W. Food. "I've been there a bunch of times and thought, 'This food is so awesome. How do I work this out to bring it here?'"

For the record, a playska is derived from a pljeskavica, a Balkan street-food patty made with ground lamb, pork, beef or veal, served here on a housemade pogacha roll with flecks of bacon and topped with a red-pepper sauce and a cream cheese.

That sandwich is far from the only food that Wiechmann is psyched to serve at his new spot, slated to open in late fall. He'll also be showcasing ground meat in cevapcici, little finger sausages made in Bosnia that will be served on pita bread with a yogurt sauce. And there will be Balkan pies, made from hand-stretched phyllo dough and stuffed with savory seasonal fillings such as feta with sausage or kale.

"It's halfway between a spanakopita and a strudel," Wiechmann says of the pies. "They're very particular about them when you go there. I'm hoping to uphold their level of quality."

That quality is expected to carry over to the pastries and breads, such as challah, and the coffee from Karma, a boutique roaster in Sudbury. Such fare will be available for take-out and sit-down service from breakfast to dinner in the 16-seat space, located in the former home of Rosie's Bakery and decorated with plenty of memorabilia from the Balkans.

In addition to helping to educate Bostonians about Balkan cuisine, Wiechmann is looking forward to doing a little bit of learning himself. "One of the things that's awesome is I'm going to essentially own a bakery. I've studied a little bit of baking, and in all of my restaurants we do our own breads, but this is me full-on figuring out how to be a baker, too," he says. "I'm really excited about bringing a unique cuisine to Boston again, and doing something that's accessible and not fine dining. It's just unique."

Good Eats: Oodles of Noodles

Hand-pulled noodles now have a serious foothold in Boston's Chinese food scene, but it's only recently that we've had a local source for the style known as dao xiao mian. Live Noodles, opened in Packard's Corner by a former co-owner of MDM Noodles, features the so-called sliced, shaved or knife-cut variety that are peeled from a block of dense wheat dough with a sharp blade. The slick, chewy, ragged-edged ribbons are served either stir-fried with crisp bok choy, bean sprouts, scallions and a protein of your choice or swimming in a deep bowl of meaty broth. / Elizabeth Bomze

BRIGHT IDEAS. "I like the authenticity of showing how things are screwed together," says Alex Jaynes of Charlestown's A. Jaynes Woodworks, who created this abstract lighting fixture tacked with exposed copper nails. Its hand-planed ash arms were bent with steam and capped with copper cylinders, each bearing a light bulb powered by cords sheathed in blue fabric.

SETTING THE TABLE: Boston's Structure Design and Build created the 8x8-foot table of local ash wood procured from a family-run sawmill, collaborating with Rhode Island's Whetstone Workshop on the copper gilding around the metal base. SD&B also designed the benches, which "nod to New England maritime culture," says owner Peter Jackson Hussey.

TAKE A SEAT: Six chairs from Infusion Furniture tweaked an existing design by the Milton firm, says owner Quentin Kelley. Some modifications, like the splayed front legs, yielded what is now sold as Infusion's K&A Dining Chair. Kelley adds that the contoured seat of ash wood, popular in th Scandinavian design that inspires him, is surprisingly comfy on the tus

FURNISHING FASHION

This month, Kit and Ace, the fast-growing Canadian fashion brand helmed by the former lead designer of Lululemon, opened a 3,500-square-foot shop on Newbury Street. Refreshing your wardrobe? Great. It has you covered in technical cashmere and other luxury fabrics designed to maintain shape, avoid pilling and work in the wash. Outfitting a room? Excellent. Find inspiration in the local artisans Kit and Ace tapped to create the store's "supper club" section, which will host pop-up dinner parties for movers and shakers of the local creative class. We got to know the clever craftsmen behind the store's sleek look. / Scott Kearnan

A New Brunswick

Kit and Ace isn't the only newcomer plying performance wear for sweater weather. "You know that layer you have on the back of your chair at work? We want that to be Brunswick Park," says Jess Garbarino, cofounder of the new Boston-based apparel brand, which met its $25,000 fundraising goal on Sept. 29, less than 24 hours into its Kickstarter campaign. In February, backers can expect shipments of Brunswick Park's first batch of hoodies, bomber jackets and blazers, made from a machine-washable custom merino wool blend designed to wick moisture, keep its shape and stretch for comfort. "[Cofounder Alex Weaver and I] are both pretty entrenched in the startup community here in Boston, and our day-to-day schedules have us running all over the city. We didn't have pieces that could keep up with us," says Garbarino, who named the brand after the street she grew up on in Melrose. "Coincidentally, Brunswick is also the name of the town where Alex went to college. It was pretty serendipitous." / Jacqueline Houton

OREGON, HAIL!

The best place in the U.S. to produce pinot noir is debatable, but Oregon's Willamette Valley has to be in the discussion. Its cool, sunny and dry climate (at least until the heavens open each autumn with relentless rain) generally enables the region's artisanal producers to fashion pinots in a less flamboyantly fruity style, with understatement and delicate flavor nuance. This is one category where most of the examples are good. The following three are exceptional. / Sandy Block

BENTON-LANE PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
Produced by one of the many pinot-obsessed refugees who headed north from California in a quest for the perfect pinot noir terroir, Benton-Lane has been around for more than 25 years, which makes it a relative.old-timer in Willamette Valley. With earthy and floral scents, and cherry, smoky, beet root-like flavors, this bottle is a savory mouthful of delicious pinot noir fruit that's tart and minerally on the palate. This wine is built for food, so try it with grilled salmon or chicken breast.
$27, Whole Foods, Cambridge

ROCO PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
A relatively new venture by Rollin Soles, a highly regarded winemaker for years at Argyle, Roco is a small player that does everything from harvesting to production by hand. This pinot is right on the mark: highly aromatic with mint, baking spice and clove aromas, lush on the palate with red berries, some mineral earthiness and a smooth texture. It's a balanced drink with enough flavor to enjoy on its own or with a range of food from cheeses to medium-textured fish.

LANGE PINOT NOIR, WILLAMETTE VALLEY, 2012
Lange is one of many small family wineries in Oregon that consistently makes excellent wine, but this vintage really stands out. A juicy pinot noir, the best of a recent blind tasting, this bottle features toasty, dark cherry and plum flavors accented by spice, mint, tar and leather. This wine is well structured, round and minerally, with a silky sensual texture. It will pair especially well with slightly spicy duck or lamb preparations
$32, Lower Falls Wine Co., Newton

HAVE YOUR THOUGHTS ON YOUR MEMOIR CHANGED WITH TIME? After I wrote that book I read it a lot. I sat in bed, holding it in my hands, kind of unable to believe that it was real. Then, after I got over myself, I put the book aside for a long time. I don't know if I read it at all until 2012, when I began to prepare the revised 10th anniversary edition. There were so many things I would have changed or corrected, now that I am 10 years smarter about the complexities of transgender experience, but for the most part I let everything stay the same. As the saying goes, I stand by all my mistakes. The new edition does have a short new introduction and two new "epilogue" chapters, one by me and one by my wife.

WHAT'S BEEN A POSITIVE OUTCOME OF WORKING ON I AM CAIT? Caitlyn [Jenner] is a very unusual person—not only because of her history but also because of her privilege. No one in their right mind should confuse her with a typical transgender person. That said, just the tremendous visibility of her coming out put our stories on the radar

YOU'VE WORKED IN SO MANY DIFFERENT ARENAS—WHAT IS YOUR DREAM PROJECT? In my fantasy world, I have a one-woman show that consists of me telling stories and performing my original songs. Of course, an obstacle to this is that one of the instruments that I play is the autoharp... Also, I have a voice kind of like Rochester from The Jock Benny Show Still, a girl can dream

LOVE AFFAIRS PAST AND PRESENT ALIGN IN A LOCALLY SET NOVEL.

Published by Simon & Schuster, 304 pages, $26

GHOSTLY EVEN WHEN SHE WAS alive, poet Emily Dickinson hovers over everyone in this book. Her married brother Austin has an affair with the younger Mabel, who's also married, leading Austin to totally disregard his actual family. Mabel's husband cheerfully enables the affair, and Emily tacitly encourages them, listening at the door, even observing the bodice unlacing. Nicholson conveys the pair's romance both in their authentic 1880s language, found in letters and diaries, and in his own words, which sometimes feel suspiciously modern but often resemble the 19th-century lovers' rapturous declarations.

Fast-forward to the present, and we meet Alice, who is writing a screenplay about the drama that played out in Amherst—which included Mabel collecting Emily's poems and getting them published posthumously, clinching her fame. During her research, Alice gets involved with the married Nick, an older, sexy lapsed professor. While she puzzles out the intricacies of the long-ago affair, Nick emerges as Emily's double of sorts, a maddeningly elusive man half in love with death. Nicholson has all his characters wondering what love is: an ideology, an actual relationship, passion? It can get rather cerebral, but Nicholson, an Oscar-nominated screenwriter himself, also gives us a story that evokes the juicy angst of love and loss.

FROM PAGE 109: Emily was beyond fear or favor. She had never set eyes on Mabel. She was the Myth. She lived apart, accepting the pain and the freedom of loneliness. For all these reasons, Mabel bowed her head before her, almost in worship. And now, she learned, her deity graciously received her prayers, and smiled upon her. ◆

BUENAS VISTAS: Stunning architecture, murals and contemporary art mix in Mexico City.

Traveler's Checks

With six nonstop Aeromexico flights from Boston every week, getting to Mexico City has never been easier. Once there, don't discount the newly rchabilitated neighborhoods. Condesa, the district that was home to the old horse racing track, has chic boutique hotels, like the Hippodrome, and is centrally located.

At an altitude of 7,382 feet, the weather is spring-like year-round; there's never a bad time to visit, but July is surprisingly ideal. It rains for an hour or two nearly every day, which keeps things crisp, while temperatures tend to hover in the 70s during the day and the 50s at night.

The Escape Artist / Jonathan Soroff

ARTISTIC RICHES AWAIT SOUTH OF THE BORDER IN MEXICO CITY.

Americans tend to regard Mexico City as a congested, crime-infested volcano crater. Not true. Starting in the 1990s, efforts to clean the air (once so bad that birds were said to drop dead midflight) have resulted in drastically reduced pollution, while the city's reputation for street crime (also drastically reduced) is no more warranted than in any other major metropolis. As a result, visitors can now often see the ring of mountain peaks surrounding the city from the downtown traffic circle dominated by the iconic Ángel de la Independencia, and wandering the streets after dark feels no more threatening than it does in Manhattan. What's more, few places in the Western Hemisphere rival the D.F., as it's affectionately known, for art, architecture, design and cuisine. From the pre-colonial days (when a spectacular Aztec metropolis floated in the middle of a lake) through the Spanish colonial era, the Revolution of 1910 and today, the sensory has always been central, and for anyone with an ounce of imagination, Mexico City is a veritable smorgasbord.

A pillar of the city's artistic patrimony is muralism, and its birthplace is the Antiguo Colegio de San Ildefonso, a 16th-century Jesuit college-turned-cultural center, where visitors can see Diego Rivera's first mural and feast on the satirical work of José Clemente Orozco, which chronicles the country's political and social struggles and covers much of the interior courtyards. For lovers of Rivera and his iconic wife, Frida Kahlo, two pilgrimages are necessary. The first is the Museo Casa Estudio Diego Rivera y Frida Kahlo, the artists' studio/living space built in 1931, one of the earliest examples of functionalist architecture. The couple lived there during their tumultuous marriage, but equally significant to their story is the Casa Azul, Kahlo's childhood home and the place where she died. Also known as the Frida Kahlo Museum, it now houses much of her art and personal belongings.

As for contemporary art, the Mexico City scene is booming, and while the Tamayo Museum in Chapultepec Park is justifiably world-famous, the breadth is best experienced in lesser-known spaces. Ground zero is Kurimanzutto, a gallery/collective that hosted a show by enfant terrible Dr. Lakra this past summer and represents more than 30 of Mexico's top working artists. Meanwhile, the Museo Jumex—built by the heir to the Mexican fruit juice fortune—spans 45,000 square feet and is said to hold the largest private contemporary art collection in Latin America, and it's open to the public. Two other gold mines are the Museo Universitario Arte Contemporáneo and the "El Chopo" University Museum, housed in the former National History Museum, which exhibits edgy, thought-provoking work, including a recent show on the gay rights movement. And the lazy culture vulture need walk no farther than one square city block to see the World Heritage Site home of Pritzker Prize-winning modernist architect Luis Barragán, the Archivo Diseño y Arquitectura (founded in 2012 by Fernando Romero and his wife, Soumaya Slim, daughter of Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim), and the cutting-edge gallery Labor.

If all of this sounds dizzying, it is, but it's a testament to the artistic renaissance taking place in Mexico City, which is transforming neighborhoods where tourists would never previously visit into must-sees. Santa Maria la Ribera, which was devastated by the 1985 earthquake, is re-emerging as an artsy, bohemian neighborhood; it's also home to the incomparably beautiful Moorish Kiosk, designed to serve as Mexico's pavilion at the 1884 Universal Exhibition. Meanwhile, the Roma district has become the epicenter of hipster culture, with restaurants, clubs, bars, shops and galleries redolent of Brooklyn.

Alas, man does not live on art alone, but fortunately the city's culinary scene is keeping pace with its art, architecture and design. Pujol has had tongues wagging since it opened in the early aughts, Chapulín offers fine dining wrapped in high design, and Quintonil—No. 35 on the 2015 list of "The World's 50 Best Restaurants"—serves up a modernist take on traditional Mexican fare. Basque-meets-Mexican restaurant Biko also earned a spot on the top-50 list, but even off-the-beaten-track places like Casa Virginia serve superb food. Little wonder that Mexico City has surfaced on every foodie's short list as a dining destination.

Once upon a time, a stroll around the Zocalo and an opera at the Palace of Fine Arts was the sine qua non of culture in Mexico City. Now, the needle's been moved and the options beggar description. So the next time your neighbors plan a trip to Cancun or Cabo, opt for the artistic riches of Mexico's capital. You'll come back with much more than a tan. ◆

Upmarket Asian cuisine is enjoying a boomlet in Boston. Banyan is already drawing South End crowds with its beautiful room and glamorous East/West fusion. Top Chef star Tiffani Faison is about to debut Tiger Mama in the Fenway, while David Punch is set to open Little Big Diner in Newton Centre. The latest addition to this umami-rich stew is Hojoko, from Tim and Nancy Cushman, owners of O Ya, the modern Japanese eatery that is the city's most expensive restaurant. If you've been hoping to sample the Cushmans' nationally acclaimed work but balked at O Ya's tariff, Hojoko is your relatively budget-priced ticket.

Set in Fenway's rock 'n' roll-themed Verb Hotel (once a Howard Johnson's, get it?), Hojoko has none of O Ya's temple-like serenity: It's a rollicking, capacious tavern set to a deafening rock soundtrack, hallucinogenically overstuffed with rock and surf bric-a-brac and Japanese pop-culture kitsch. A long bar is the room's centerpiece, drink-slinging a clear priority. Colorful tropical punches and hoary dating-bar drinks flow from big tanks ($7 shot, $12 drink, $48 bowl), like the Blue Hawaiian of rum, pineapple, sochu, lemon and blue Curaçao, and the Japanese Caucasian ($12), a frozen White Russian variant. Old-time Tiki lovers will appreciate the Jungle Bird ($12) of rum, coconut-infused Campari, pineapple and lime, served in a ceramic parrot mug. There's a sake for every taste: 19 in cups ($6-$18), six in 1.8-liter bottles ($100-$188). Fourteen beers on tap and in bottles ($5-$8) and five large-formats ($12-$24) favor light, food-friendly Asian brews like Okinawan rice lager Orion ($6), plus some craftier Americans. Wines are few and modest ($9-$12 glass, most bottles $35-$45). Belying the overarching fun-fun-fun aesthetic, bartenders are precise and well-versed in more serious craft cocktails. Not many Boston bars are so versatile, executing equally well on cocktails both sublime and ridiculous.

Executive chef Hart Lowry's menu embodies a like-minded combination of wit and seriousness, creativity and tradition. Nigiri and sashimi for one ($26; on one visit, tuna, mackerel and salmon sashimi and chutoro, salmon and yellowtail nigiri) offers delicately cut, pristine fish and well-seasoned sushi rice. Fancier rolls let their central ingredients shine via admirable restraint with sauces, as in fried wild black miso cod roll ($8/$16) with dashi-pickle tartar sauce, a spam-like prep of foie gras ($8/$16) with robata (charcoal-grilled) pineapple and yuzu kosho, and especially robata Maine lobster tail ($12/$24) with tomalley rice, sake/sea-urchin jus and citrus zest. These offer a glimmer of O Ya's invention, subtlety and impeccable ingredients at far gentler prices.

Robata skewers, a standby of Japanese after-work drinking joints, offer a delectable few bites. Standouts include fat whole prawns ($12) with spicy ponzu butter, crispy chicken tails ($7) with black-truffle salt (yes, chicken butt is a delicacy), and tender buttermilk-brined chicken livers ($7) with ponzu-garlic butter. A rare misfire is tsukune ($8), a long chicken meatball with raw egg-yolk dip, thanks to harsh oversalting. More beautiful and balanced is the outstanding hamachi kama ($15), fatty collar of yellowtail showered with spicy daikon, shiso, seaweed and scallion, plus ponzu for dipping. Salmon fins ($7) offers two chunks of crisp-fried salmon belly nestled in translucent garlic-chive sauce with the barest whiff of truffle salt.

Ramen lovers are treated with appetizer-sized bowls of alkaline noodles in luscious broths. Funky chicken ramen ($9) wows with a deep-flavored chicken broth and toppings of soy egg, fermented bamboo shoots and charcoal-grilled chicken. Hot dog ramen ($12) impresses with a rich pork-bone broth, scallions, nori and a crown of salty grilled frankfurter artfully sliced into a squiggly tangle. Curry somen jiru ($8) builds winsomely on skinny, pale wheat noodles and tender slices of braised chicken with a light curry/dashi broth dotted with shiitakes, scallions and daikon.

Cold dishes include a fabulous tuna poke ($11), the Hawaiian salad of raw tuna cubes, nicely balancing chili fire with creamy roasted-macadamia dressing and avocado. Potato edamame salad ($5) with dashi pickles, scallions and bonito flakes is a bowl of mild comfort. Tsukemono ($5) prettily presents three bracing seasonal pickles like kimchi, daikon and charred ramps. No self-styled tavern can do without a burger; here, the spicy tuna burger ($17) delivers a complex wallop of flavors, layering greens, pickled ginger, tomato, scallions and spicy mustard, punctuated by the surprising smack of sweet-glazed broiled eel.

Service is appropriately brash and informal, showing impressive command of the long menu and admirable accuracy in capturing orders amid the din. Note that a typical procession of drinks and plates can quickly add up. While not reaching mortgage-payment heights, the tab may surprise diners used to less-refined Asian restaurants: Budget for a higher-end sushi place, not a cheerful Chinatown joint. Still, I'm hopeful that Hojoko and its swank new competitors will goose Bostonians to an overdue resetting of price expectations for modern Asian cuisine. Food and drink this carefully wrought in a kicky setting ain't cheap, but Hojoko demonstrates that it can be a real value. ◆

ASK CHERYL

Q: I HAVE BAGS AND DARK CIRCLES UNDER MY EYES THAT MAKE ME LOOK OLD AND TIRED. WHAT ARE MY OPTIONS?

A: Bags under the eyes are caused by pockets of fat, but are not associated with being overweight. This type of fat cannot be controlled by diet; it is a hereditary condition.

The best way to eliminate these bags is through surgery. The technical term for cosmetic eyelid surgery is blepharoplasty. After surgery you look totally natural and look like yourself, but more alert and refreshed.

This one-hour surgical procedure is an office-based procedure that is performed under local anesthetic. No anesthesia or sedation is necessary. The recovery time is around a week. During this period you will feel fine and can drive, shop, and maintain normal activities. However, there will be swelling and bruising around the eyes for a few days.

The first step is a consultation with an ophthalmic plastic surgeon, an eye surgeon who specializes in plastic surgery, such as Dr. Daniel Townsend at SkinHealth. You want to find a surgeon who has lots of experience, and Dr. Townsend has successfully performed over 19,000 of these procedures.

IN FROM THE COLD

SPIELBERG'S FACT-BASED DRAMA FRAMES THE COLD WAR THROUGH A MODERN LENS.

THIS HAS BECOME THE YEAR OF ESPIONAGE films. Guy Ritchie's breezily entertaining big-screen reimagining of The Man from U.N.C.L.E., an early-'60s-set prequel of the 1964-68 TV series, sadly came and went pretty quickly, but we'd already been treated to a wealth of wonderful spy movies in cinemas. Ritchie clearly enjoyed paying homage to James Bond just as much as Matthew Vaughn did with his comic book-spawned Kingsman: The Secret Service and Paul Feig did with his more broadly comic Spy, while Christopher McQuarrie's thrilling Mission: Impossible – Rogue Nation improved upon almost everything those pictures did well, reigniting the public's passion for couch-jumping crazy Tom Cruise, who really must be insane to film his own spectacular stunts. The jury's still out on Spectre, Oscar-winning director Sam Mendes' dour-looking Bond picture that features Daniel Craig's fourth outing as 007, but it will likely have a license to kill all of its onscreen competition when it shoots into cineplexes in early November.

But before then, you can satisfy your spycraft cravings with Steven Spielberg's Bridge of Spies. A handsome dramatization of real events that took place during the late '50s and early '60s, the multiple Oscar winner's latest finds him returning to the talents of one of his (and America's) favorite leading men, Tom Hanks. For their fourth collaboration, Hanks dials down the comic instincts that defined his early career, slipping comfortably back into Jimmy Stewart's old shoes as modern cinema's everyman. He plays Cold War hero James B. Donovan, who defends himself and others armed not with a gun, but with the Constitution.

Donovan may end up in East Berlin on the titular Glienicke Bridge, but he's no spy; he's a lawyer, which comes in handy when the U.S. government arrests accused spy Rudolf Ivanovich Abel, a balding, unassuming man in horn-rimmed glasses. Donovan is tapped as the defense attorney for the "Colonel," as the federal agents call the British-born

Mind you, Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy is what shows through.

Soviet citizen during his arrest in the film's masterful prologue—a wordless sequence that makes the 54-year-old art enthusiast's guilt explicit. It tracks Abel from his Brooklyn apartment to the foot of the Brooklyn Bridge, where he sets up his easel and sits on a public bench, painting while secretly intercepting a coded message hidden inside a false nickel he retrieves from the bench's underside. It's obvious to us (but not him) that he's been tailed through New York's streets and subways by agents who nevertheless botch the bust back at his apartment when we (but not they) witness him destroying the evidence, keeping his composure as he finally adds dialogue to the scene, asking "Mind if I fetch my teeth?"

Does Donovan believe his coolly expressionless client is guilty? It doesn't matter, given the lawyer's belief that "everyone deserves a defense. Everyone matters." Nevertheless, it becomes obvious to Donovan that no one else feels this way during a pretrial meeting with Judge Mortimer Byers (Dakin Matthews), who demonstrates what little interest he has in the concept of "innocent until proven guilty" as it relates to Abel.

What's more, Donovan understands what will happen to his reputation when he defends one of the most hated men in the country, despite the protestations of his wife, Mary (Amy Ryan, who's unfortunately given very little to do). "Everyone will hate me," he realizes, "but at least I'll lose." Perhaps Donovan has a touch of that Hanks humor, after all.

Then again, maybe much of the understated humor in the film—from the snappy patter to the enjoyably eccentric characters Donovan encounters once he's recruited by CIA director Allen Dulles (Peter McRobbie) to arrange a spy exchange—comes from a script that is credited to Joel and Ethan Coen, working from an earlier draft by Matt Charman. That's right, the Coen brothers.

Mind you, Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy is what shows through, so if you're hoping for ironic snark, be aware that this is no Inside Llewyn Davis, even if the cold, snowy palette of the Coens' most recent masterpiece pops up in an East Berlin that's so desaturated it's almost rendered in black and white, courtesy of Spielberg's longtime cinematographer, Janusz Kaminski.

Speaking of frequent collaborators, this is the first Spielberg film since 1985's The Color Purple that hasn't been scored by John Williams, who backed out due to health issues. Nevertheless, composer Thomas Newman does his best to emulate Williams' playbook on at least half the cues. One such piece (reliant on a Lincoln-like arrangement of strings and horns) is used in a sequence that cross-cuts between Jim arguing Abel's appeal before the Supreme Court and a U-2 spy plane mission that ends abruptly with pilot Francis Gary Powers (Austin Stowell) being shot down over Russia.

The trade that Donovan is tasked with is an even swap: Abel for Powers. But when he learns that innocent American student Frederic Pryor (Will Rogers) is also being held in East Berlin, our hero hopes to negotiate the release of both Powers and Pryor, despite the U.S. government's lack of concern for the student. To them, he's a nobody—but to Donovan, every American deserves freedom. Bridge of Spies may be set during the height of the Cold War, but Spielberg's subtext is progressively modern; freedom isn't truly free if you value national security and state secrets over our Constitution. ◆

TIME KEEPER

RIHANNA'S ONE-TIME DUET PARTNER PLOTS HIS OWN ASCENT AS A DYNAMIC SINGER

MIKKY EKKO ENJOYED A JUMP-START on mainstream-pop exposure when he sang a duet with Rihanna on her video-driven 2012 single "Stay," a song that Ekko cowrote with Lana Del Rey associate Justin Parker. Rihanna even performed the hit at the 2013 Grammys, where Ekko emerged from the shadows to join in. Then he practically returned to the shadows to complete his debut album.

"It was an incredible opportunity to collaborate," Ekko says of Rihanna recording his song and sharing a Grammy moment. But the Nashville-based singer wasn't in any rush to finish his major-label debut, despite industry advisers who urged him to jump on that interest and momentum. He finally released Time in January.

"I don't give a shit about fame, but I do give a shit about my art and reaching people," Ekko, 30, says from an LA tour stop. "I'm excitable, but I'm also really stubborn... It made things a little confusing for a while, and I had to question whether people were there to help me continue to grow as an artist or to make sure they don't lose their jobs for [not] capitalizing on a particular moment."

Ekko didn't include "Stay" on his own album, though he's likely to sing the song on Oct. 22 when he hits Brighton Music Hall. "That was such a massive song that I needed time for it to simmer down, because it's not the kind of song that defines the album I made," he says. "You want people to have a clear picture."

"I'm excitable, but I'm also really stubborn... It made things a little confusing for a while."

For Ekko, that picture's more like a kaleidoscope, given his slick, eclectic mix of pop, R&B and hip-hop. For Time, he enlisted coproducers from OneRepublic's kindred singer Ryan Tedder to hip-hop maverick Clams Casino to TV on the Radio programmer David Sitek. The album's polished hodgepodge spans the bubbly pop pulse of "Smile," the slinky R&B throb of "U," the slashing rock of "Riot" and the acoustic, string-sweetened buildup of the title track before Ekko drops closer to "Stay" terrain in hip-hop piano ballads "Mourning Doves" and "Comatose."

The thread that ties it all together is his highly dramatic, melismatic voice, which suggests Jeff Buckley in more of an R&B context. "It never gets any Auto-Tune, and I'm very particular how it's treated," Ekko says. In addition to Buckley, the singer cites other rock influences like Radiohead, Nirvana, Björk and Animal Collective as well as R&B/soul greats Stevie Wonder and Brian McKnight. Born John Stephen Sudduth in Louisiana, Mikky Ekko (a name he adopted for its phonetic simplicity) also grew up singing in church, since his father was a preacher. "In a lot of my songs," he says, "there's a reverence and a desire for connection."

There's also an underlying darkness to both his music and his lyrics about romantic struggle. "I'm desperate to find places I've never been," he says, "whether that means finding places sonically or aesthetically that other people have created—and learning about those—or pushing myself to the brink of an emotional state to get to that place."

One thing he hasn't discovered: How Rihanna actually heard his big song. "I was in London working on a production and got a phone call saying, 'Hey, Rihanna wants "Stay" for her album,' and I was so surprised that I hung up and just went back to sleep because I thought it was a joke at first," he says. "It was a pretty intense time in general, knowing that magic can happen."

And if magic now happens on a smaller scale, that's OK with Ekko. "What's most exciting to me now is a lot of the people who are coming to the shows are really people who support the album and where I'm headed as an artist," says the lanky, curly-coiffed singer, who's fronting a live band that features electric guitar, a keyboard and synthesizer and electro-acoustic drums. "I stuck to my guns." ◆

VIRAL VIDEO STAR "BOSTON FISH GUY" HAS ME LONGING TO DROP MY R'S ONCE MORE.

When I was in high school, deep in Maine, I harbored an abiding belief that I had no accent. A lot of those other kids, hoo, they had friggin' wicked accents, but not me. I figured I sounded like a Midwestern news anchor. One of my friends and I even started a Maine dictionary to catalog and define the unintelligible dialect of our classmates. "'Magin," meant "Yes, I would agree with that statement," while "I'mma guzzle some pounders and get right sideways" translated as "I intend to drink 16-ounce Anheuser-Busch beverages until I am intoxicated." Implicit in our goofing was the belief that of course we didn't talk like that.

But one day I brought a video camera to chronicle our school's unfortunately named Senior Slave Day, when underclass students would pay to make seniors do their bidding. In the case of my friend Josh, that meant wearing a dress all day. I captured that outfit on video while Josh threatened to kick my ass. The tape went in a box and was forgotten for about 20 years until I decided to digitize it for posterity.

When I opened the .mov file on my computer, there was Josh wearing the dress, hiding his face and threatening to administer a beatdown, just as I remembered. And there was my voice, from behind the camera, declaring, "I don't know how fast you can run in that dress." Or at least, that's what I thought I said at the time. What it actually sounds like now is "Ahnt newha faas yuginrhunin thaa draas." Well, jesum crow: I had a Maine accent. And not a mild one, either.

Initially, I was embarrassed at this revelation. Some part of my self-image rests on the premise that I've always pronounced my R's. And yet, here was clear evidence that I sounded about as intelligible as Fred Gwynne, aka Herman Munster, in Pet Sematary. Nice dress, Jaaash. And stay away from those old Micmac burial grounds!

Apparently I lost my accent in college, although I didn't make any conscious effort to do so—because, of course, I didn't think I had one in the first place. Other kids, though, underwent purposeful accent-ectomies. My friend Chris went to Boston College High School in Dorchester, and he arrived at college freshman year sounding like he could've been Mark Wahlberg's cellmate on Deer Island. He quickly decided to scrub his accent. "I realized," he said, "that when you first meet people, a Massachusetts accent doesn't make you sound like the smartest guy in the world." He's a doctor now, so I think it would've been great if he'd kept his accent: "Nahhhse, pass me them syringes. This dude's got a wicked friggin' hematomer."

The Boston accent's had a lot of national press lately, courtesy of both Black Mass and one Michael Bergin, better known as the Boston Fish Guy. I feel a certain kinship with Bergin because a couple of years ago, out on my boat, we got an up-close visit from a great white shark. I, too, shot a video, but before posting it on YouTube I erased the audio track. Why? Because we all sounded like the Boston Fish Guy, profanely trying to suss out what we were looking at, but with an added element of total pants-wetting cowardice. I just cued up the unedited version to see if it's as bad as I remember, and in fact it's worse. "That's not a whale," I say, before my nephew Brian blurts, "Dude, that's a shark! Holy shit! Should we get the fuck out of here?" He's not even from Boston, but confronting a mythic leviathan in Massachusetts waters obviously prompts a certain type of reaction, including constant profanity and an overreliance on the word "dude."

While I never went out of my way to eradicate my accent, I now sort of wish I had it back.

While I never went out of my way to eradicate my accent, I now sort of wish I had it back. Or at least, it'd be nice to summon it for certain occasions. A couple months ago I went to my high-school reunion, and I longed to drop back into the local dialect. But I can't do it anymore. I've been gone too long. If I even tried, I'd sound like Herman Munster imitating Tim Sample. I can imitate the economy of jaw motion, the tetanus-afflicted ventriloquism of Maine diction, but the words don't come out right. Or wrong, depending on your point of view. I'd have to spend a lot of time guzzling pounders in New Harbor before I sounded like anything other than an imposter.

In ruminating on the value of an accent, I decided to email the Fish Guy himself to ask if he'd ever thought about trying to get rid of his accent. Bergin replied, "Why would I want to do something dumb like that, man? I'm from the streets, kid. Good luck tryin' to get that out of me." 'Magin. ◆

JOHN D. SPOONER IS AN INVESTMENT ADVISER, author and novelist. His most recent book is No One Ever Told Us That: Money and Life Lessons for Young Adults. Here, he responds to queries from advice seekers of all ages. Send your conundrums to thedance@improper.com

I work in an office where most of my coworkers are a lot younger than me. On occasion, we grab drinks after work. It's a lot of fun, but I'm constantly getting teased for my seniority. I recently tried to cover up some of my gray hairs, but it ended in total embarrassment. I feel like I'm becoming somewhat of a joke to them. I really wish there were men my age that I could relate to, but I still want to be friendly with my coworkers. What should I do? You have something few of your younger friends have—years of experience—and you can do everyone a favor by turning your age into an advantage. There's a reason the very first chapter in my new book is called "Take the Pro to Lunch." Counseling so many millennials, I find that they love stories of the past that reveal how business was done before the last five years. The stories you tell should teach lessons about the mistakes you made, the bosses you had, the business tips that can serve them well. If you tell these tales with a sense of humor, in a self-deprecating, not preachy way, your young friends may look at you more positively. And they may take some of the wisdom that you earned the hard way, particularly because you're not their parent.

My friend runs an event-planning business and keeps promising to invite me to some of the high-profile events he plans. I can't tell if he's blowing me off, but I have yet to get an invite, though he insists it just keeps slipping his mind. How can I get into one of these events without being too overbearing on my friend? The very best way to get his attention and make sure you're on the invitation list is to buy yourself some personal notecards. Then you write your friend and say something simple like "I'm so looking forward to the kind of parties you've described to me." He can ignore emails and texts, even phone conversations. But he can't ignore a handwritten note on lovely stationery. His guilt level spikes. Then, you either get a bunch of invitations, or you get a new friend. And you'll have fine stationery as ammunition for the next friend you want to put to the test.

Recently, I started seeing a guy I met at a concert. We started talking, and he told me that he is in his own band. I was impressed, and we started dating soon after. However, my friends to whom I have introduced him think that he is a complete burnout and lacks ambition, but I find him fun and exciting. Even my mother is worried about me now because he's not on a traditional career path. Should I heed their advice or go with my heart? Well, in my view, you're going with a lot more than your heart in this deal. "Fun and exciting" are things worth experiencing, particularly when you're young. You should also know that there are people in your life who do not want you to have "fun and exciting" for all kinds of reasons. Some of them might wish that they had it.

But I'll let you in on a little secret that perhaps you might know by now: Musicians are bad bets for long-term relationships. So are most creative people—actors, writers, painters. Those professions are often too tough to conquer... and the participants may be way too invested in their own dreams to take care of you in the ways you want to be cared about.

So enjoy the fling, or the romance. You can always lead with your heart. As long as you end up relying on your brain more than anything else.

If you tell these tales with a sense of humor... your young friends may look at you more positively.

I started a great new job recently and made a big move from the suburbs to the city. One of my coworkers and I have begun spending more time together during work. He will come over to my desk and chat with me, but nothing beyond that. However, yesterday, he asked me if I wanted to grab coffee with him before work. I don't want an office fling to distract me from my new job, but I am interested in him. Even worse, I cannot tell if this is a date or just a friendly gesture. What is the proper etiquette in this situation? It's not quite a friendly gesture, and it isn't a date. So treat it as a "friendly gesture," but know that your coworker likely is interested in you. Coffee will make it easy to find out about his status: single, or married, or "other."

As an insecure person, I personally hate the idea of coffee. Intentions are clearer over cocktails and dinner, and there's no pressure to rush back to work. As for the concept of an office fling, in my many years of observing work-time romance, I've found it is almost always a terrible idea. A short-term affair isn't worth the trouble. ◆

BIG SELLER

THE REAL ESTATE BIGWIG DISHES ON TRICKS OF THE TRADE, HIS ACTING CAREER AND TAYLOR SWIFT.

STAR OF BRAVO REALITY SERIES MILLION DOLLAR Listing New York Ryan Serhant, 31, was raised in Topsfield and attended the Pingree School before studying theater and English literature at Hamilton College. After graduating, he moved to New York to pursue a career in acting, and he landed the role of Evan Walsh on As the World Turns in 2007. He then got into the real estate business and now works for Nest Seekers International; his team came in at No. 1 in New York on REAL Trends' 2015 national sales rankings. He recently played a hedge-fund manager in Noah Baumbach's film While We're Young, and he's appeared in real estate segments on CNN, CNBC, Fox, NBC, ABC and CBS. He lives with his fiancee in Manhattan.

JONATHAN SOROFF: Anyone ever mistake you for Ryan Seacrest?
RYAN SERHANT: Every single day. That's why I'm sure to end every conversation by saying "Seacrest out."

So is real estate really all about location, location, location? Yes, absolutely. There's no question.

One trick to help a property sell quickly? Have it be beautiful. You'd be amazed by how many people try to sell a property when it looks gross.

One thing that adds value to a property that people don't realize? White paint. I can't say it enough.

Biggest mistake most sellers make? Not using Ryan Serhant as their broker.

How about buyers? Not using Ryan Serhant as their broker.

Most unreasonable request you've ever gotten from a client? It was filmed, actually, on our first season. It was to find the client an apartment for his wallaby. It is illegal to keep a wallaby as a pet in the city of New York.

Most ridiculous lengths you've ever gone to for a deal? Getting on an airplane to London to see a client and get them to sign something when they were on the fence.

Ever do a deal that you felt was a mistake afterward? No. Every deal I do is the greatest deal in the history of the world. You have to look at it that way.

Anything you regret doing in the line of duty? [Laughs.] I took my clothes off at an open house once to steal the thunder away from another broker.

What's the most expensive property you've ever sold? $37 million. But I have a listing now for close to $49 million, so if that sells, I'll be setting a new record for myself.

Is New York real estate just ridiculously overpriced? No. Parts of New York are overpriced, but on a worldwide level, New York is actually inexpensive.

Do you look at property while you're on vacation? No. It's like that classic episode of Friends where she meets a gynecologist, and he says, "You know, if you serve coffee for a living, the last thing you wanna do when you get home is look at another cup of coffee."

Is the real estate business like show business? Yes. Very much so. The job of putting a deal together for an apartment is very similar to putting a movie together. You're creating a project, lining up investors, bringing something to the market that you hope everybody's going to want. And if it bombs, everyone is pissed off at the same time.

How much money would it take for you to do a porn movie with [Listing costar and former adult film star] Fredrik Eklund? No amount of money. Well, maybe one trillion dollars. [Laughs.]

Where is your ideal home? A penthouse apartment at the top of a skyscraper with 360-degree views of the city.

One thing anyone can do to make their place more marketable? Remove any and all clutter.

Has being on TV improved your business? Yes. Probably by 800 percent.

Best place to invest in real estate? The East Village.

"Everybody at some point or some time is dealing with real estate.... Everyone wants to know where everyone else lives."

What's your favorite real estate porn? Architectural Digest.

Favorite real estate show beside your own? I don't really have time to watch TV, so I really do only watch Million Dollar Listing.

Is the real estate business intrinsically sexy? Yes. Everybody at some point or some time is dealing with real estate, whether they're buying, selling, renting, whatever, and that interplay is sexy. Everyone wants to know where everyone else lives.

Are looks important in your business? Not as important as knowledge. There are some very, very unattractive brokers who are very smart and knowledgeable about the market, and they do just fine.

Any more acting roles lined up after While We're Young? Yes. I did a guest spot on that show The Mysteries of Laura with Debra Messing. Then there are two other movies that I'm not allowed to discuss quite yet.

Is Noah Baumbach a genius? Yes. Without a doubt.

Best part of doing a soap opera? Being paid to be overly dramatic.

Best address in New York? Right now? 220 Central Park South.

Best address in Boston? I would say somewhere in the Back Bay area—the neighborhood is stunning, especially when the seasons are changing. The Back Bay is elegant, in a wonderful location, and it reminds me of New York's Upper East Side.

Hottest amenity in real estate right now? A DJ room. Kids are getting into being DJs now the way we played video games as kids.

If you could sell any celebrity a home, who would it be and why? Taylor Swift and how could you even ask me why?! It's T. Swift!

MARCUS SMART

Smart sheds the rookie label this season, but he's expected to take on a new label: starting point guard. The Celtics have historically had great point guards, and the 21-year-old will now have a chance to join those ranks and showcase his All-Star potential. There are almost no questions about his defense, but it's the addition of ball-handling duties that provides the most intrigue—and an opportunity for Smart to break out.

As the league's top postseason producer during the Bruins' two runs to the Stanley Cup Finals, Krejci ups his game when it matters most. But thanks to an injury-filled year, he never got that chance in 2015 as the Bruins missed the playoffs for the first time since 2007. The center will be asked to replicate his playoff magic during the regular season so that the Bruins don't go home in April once again.

He made his bones with the New York Knicks before landing a six-year, $80 million deal with the Golden State Warriors in 2010. But the two-time All-Star took a bench role last season during the Warriors' championship run. Traded to Boston during the offseason, the 32-year-old forward might not always crack the starting lineup, but he should get a chance to reverse last season's statistical slide

The Dorchester native's return to Boston is all most fans can talk about. But if they just focus on his hometown, they're missing the whole story. Hayes is coming off a career-high 35 points with the Florida Panthers. The 6-foot-5-inch BC alum often used his large frame to force the action in front of the net, racking up a number of goals near the crease. He doesn't necessarily need to use his size to level every opponent he sees, but if he can use it to score, he'll stay in the headlines for more than his local ties.

The Bruins' priciest acquisition this summer finished last season in Anaheim with a slew of career-high stats. Out of his 22 goals, eight were game winners, and he notched an additional eight scores in 16 postseason games—a repeat performance would contribute to a successful offense. Plus, if the 27-year-old can build on last season's statistical surge, the hardnosed left winger might just do the impossible: make Bruins fans forget about the beloved Milan Lucic.

During his time in Boston last season, Crowder stood out on the court—and not because of his thick ponytail of dreadlocks. His toughness made him an instant fan favorite (he's just as intense on Twitter, posting in all caps), and his ability to play and defend multiple positions endeared the 6-foot-6-inch forward to the coaches despite his dip in shooting efficiency. With a new five-year, $35-million contract, he'll get plenty of opportunities to further unlock his offensive potential.

Thomas led the Celtics in scoring during his 21-game stint, but he's not content with piling up stats. With bravado to match his boxing buddy Floyd Mayweather, the 26-year-old says he wants to make his first All-Star team this season. The defenseman now has two full seasons under his belt, but a decade of experience separates him from the team's top blue-liners, Dennis Seidenberg and Zdeno Chara. With injuries a concern for those two, the 24-year-old needs to shed his reputation as an offensive-minded defenseman and become more of a two-way player. Indie comics draw a crowd

COMIC BOOK connoisseurship is no longer a niche subculture, thanks in part to blockbuster movies and the growing popularity of events such as Comic Con. Indie comics may not have as many fanboys and girls, but they'll get their moment in the spotlight at the Massachusetts Independent Comics Expo (MICE), an annual festival dedicated to Boston-area artists and writers of the genre. MICE focuses on the art of creating comics, rather than on celebrity appearances or memorabilia, but that's not to say it's only for industry pros. Expect a bevy of exhibits, lectures, demos, workshops and even an "Iron Cartoonist" showdown when the free fest takes over Lesley's University Hall on Oct. 17-18. Alexandra Cavallo

LAUGH LINES Knock, knock. Who's there? Whoever I decide to be today! That's the punch line of Polish Joke, playwright David Ives' irreverent, largely autobiographical sendup of ethnic stereotypes and the American dedication to connecting with one's roots. In the Titanic Theatre Company production, the Polish-American Jasiu decides he doesn't care for his own roots and embarks on a journey to invent some new ones, trying a series of ethnicities, heritages and identities—each more improbable than the last. The comedic but emotionally charged play cracks wise through Oct. 18 at Central Square Theater. / Alexandra Cavallo

IN THE DOG HOUSE Ron "Stray Dog" Hall had a small role in Debra Granik's Oscar-nominated 2010 film Winter's Bone. Now the tattooed biker is the subject of Stray Dog, the Cambridge-born director's first documentary, an affecting portrait of a man struggling with nightmarish memories of Vietnam while going to great lengths to help his family and fellow veterans. From fixing the water-damaged floor of a grieving military mother to building a rocking horse for his own great-grandson, Hall never stops serving, despite the fact he took his uniform off years ago. Take a ride to the Brattle Theatre to catch the area premiere on Oct. 23-25. Ariana Colozzo

99 Homes ★★★1/2 You know there's something wrong when a real estate broker packs a gun. But then, Ramin Bahrani's sixth feature is set in 2010, not long after the housing market implosion of 2008, when brokers like Rick Carver (Michael Shannon) preyed on the helpless, such as Dennis Nash (Andrew Garfield), an honest construction worker in Florida who's unable to save his family home from sudden foreclosure. Out of work and luck, Dennis swallows his pride to try to get himself, his mother (Laura Dern) and his son (Noah Lomax) out of the motel where they and dozens of others in their situation have been forced to live. Making a Mephistophelean bargain, Dennis begins working for Rick, the man who kicked him out of his house. "Don't get emotional about real estate," the shark tells his protege, as Dennis all too quickly begins his transformation from prey to predator, and his slide into moral decay. To Rick, wealth equals self-respect, but Dennis is about to lose his, and the results are reminiscent of 2003's Crimson Gold, Jafar Panahi's humanist masterpiece about a good person driven to do bad things. You can see the pain in Garfield's performance, but it's Shannon who steals the film just as easily as Rick seizes homes. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Black Mass ★★ If there's one thing journeyman director Scott Cooper (Crazy Heart) gets right in this adaptation of former Boston Globe reporters Dick Lehr and Gerard O'Neill's nonfiction best-seller, it's the puggish, lived-in faces of his supporting cast—like the murderous members of James "Whitey" Bulger's notorious Winter Hill Gang, Rory Cochrane's Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and Jesse Plemons' Kevin Weeks. Alas, Mark Mallouk and Jez Butterworth's screenplay uses their first-person confessions as a framing device, only to drop it just as nonchalantly as Cooper drops Catherine Greig—Sienna Miller was filmed playing Whitey's girlfriend, but she's nowhere onscreen, one of many reasons the movie fails to find the man behind the mobster. Or rather, the man behind the makeup: As Bulger, Johnny Depp never cracks that devilish Whitey smile, probably because he's buried his matinee-idol looks under an immobile mound of prosthetics. And ice-blue contacts make him look more dead than alive—which also describes the film as a whole. It could have been a potent exploration of brotherhood, both literal and figurative (with Benedict Cumberbatch as Billy Bulger and Joel Edgerton as Whitey's townie FBI protector, John Connolly). Instead, Black Mass becomes a movie focused on bullet points rather than hits, chronological reporting lacking any depth or authorial control. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Goodnight Mommy (Ich seh, Ich seh) ★★★ Nine-year-old twins Lukas and Elias (Lukas and Elias Schwarz) sit with their mother (Susanne Wuest), a slinky Austrian TV host who's been rendered unrecognizable by layers of bandages after a hospital stay. The three are playing a game of "Who Am I?"—where the players must ask "yes" or "no" questions to guess what's written on the notes affixed to their foreheads. It should be relatively easy for her to realize the word reveals her actual identity: "Mama." Strangely, she can't quite recognize herself in the clues...and as the days go by, even the boys have trouble believing that this woman is truly their mother. Why, for example, is this once-sweet woman refusing to even acknowledge the presence of one son, while favoring the other to a suffocating degree? Set within a secluded modern country home surrounded by endless trees, exquisitely captured on 35mm film by cinematographer Martin Gschlacht (Revanche), this art-house chiller with a torture-porn heart may expose its secret early to alert viewers, but suspense remains through the final frames. (At Kendall Square and Somerville.)

Grandma ★★★1/2 Unseen in a lead film role since Big Business in 1988, Lily Tomlin's enjoying one hell of a year. First, there was her hit Netflix series, Grace and Frankie. Now, the 76-year-old actress and comedian stars in this modest and unexpectedly emotional little gem as Elle, a poet who hasn't published in decades. Elle currently has about $40 to her name, so what's she to do when her granddaughter Sage (Julia Garner) shows up unannounced needing $630 before sundown? Why, set off on an 8-hour journey in her antique Dodge Royal as the two drop in on Cam (Nat Wolff), Sage's deadbeat boyfriend and part of the reason for her troubles. They also visit a couple of Elle's old friends (played by Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox and the late Elizabeth Peña), but it's the encounters with two of Elle's exes that gives the movie much of its heft. Sam Elliott is devastating as Karl, the man she wronged decades before, while Judy Greer—playing Olivia, the younger woman Elle's recently broken up with—is finally given a role to shine in after playing the token mom in three of this summer's blockbusters. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Intern ★★★1/2 If there's something to be gleaned from movies like The Martian and this wonderful new comedy from writer/director Nancy Meyers (Something's Gotta Give), it's that films don't need villains to remain interesting. And the characters within don't need to struggle to be better people when they're pretty damn great to begin with. I'm not sure why many people don't seem to like Anne Hathaway, but as Jules Ostin, the successful, overwhelmed owner of an online fashion site, she's as good as ever. The real surprise here is Robert De Niro, who's been phoning it in for at least 15 years now. As Ben Whittaker, a 70-year-old widower who's become restless in retirement, he anchors the film with a subtle performance, and it's terrific to see him actually acting again. When Ben sees an ad looking for a "senior intern," the career company man jumps at the opportunity to join Jules' operation. The 30-something CEO doesn't want anything to do with this nattily dressed geezer at first, but he gradually, organically becomes a friend and confidante. Sure, there are brief misunderstandings between the two, but that's it for conflict. What remains is the radical idea of spending time with good people. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Learning to Drive ★★1/2 Patricia Clarkson is a treasure, but like most actresses of a certain age in Hollywood, she's in need of better scripts. Not that Isabel Coixet's comedy/drama is a bad film—it's better than most pictures that opened in August—but its story of a middle-aged Manhattan book critic taking lessons from a Sikh instructor drives down a very predictable path. Clarkson is Wendy, whose husband of 21 years (Jake Weber) has just left her. Deciding to spend more time with her daughter Tasha (Grace Gummer) in Vermont, Wendy must get a car, but first she needs a license, which is where the lessons with Darwan (Ben Kingsley) come in. He's a cabbie, an American citizen originally from India, and he's being pushed into an arranged marriage. Sarah Kernochan's stagey script is all very sitcomy, but Clarkson and Kingsley (who appeared together in Coixet's Elegy in 2008) make the situations go down easy as the two help each other to get back on the sometimes-bumpy road of life. (At West Newton.)

The Martian ★★★★ Raise your hand if you've heard this one before: Matt Damon plays an astronaut who's stranded alone on an inhospitable planet, and he's willing to do just about anything to get back home to Earth. OK, put your hand down, because The Martian isn't Interstellar. It's better. In Ridley Scott's realistically science-minded triumph, the charming actor plays Mark Watney, who's abandoned and left for dead during a mission on Mars. A splendid adaptation of Andy Weir's speculative-fiction novel, this 3-D marvel focuses on Mark's efforts to stay alive. It will take four years for a rescue mission to reach him, and even with rationing, his food supply will only last a year. "Luckily, I'm a botanist," Mark says during one of his many video log entries, a device that allows the innately likable Damon to address the audience directly through much of the film; we believe in Mark as he concludes, "I'm gonna have to science the shit out of this." Does he ever. But rather than play things for suspense, as Alfonso Cuarón did in 2013's Gravity, the 77-year-old Scott presents his picture as a paean to the enduring spirit of man's ingenuity against overwhelming odds. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Sicario ★★★ French-Canadian director Denis Villeneuve is making quite the career out of creating a sense of creeping dread. Prisoners, his bleak revenge drama from 2013, didn't quite work, but there was an intensity to the performances that was matched by the work of cinematographer Roger Deakins and composer Jóhann Jóhannsson. Both rejoin Villeneuve on his latest movie, a moderately more successful vigilante film that hides the dark heart of a thriller. Set at the lawless border that separates the U.S. from Mexico, this picture won't do much to sway Donald Trump's mind about the "rapists." Then again, the shadowy people working for unidentified U.S. agencies in this bleak look at the War on Drugs won't give you much faith in our own motivations or moral high ground, a lesson that's learned the hard way by idealistic federal agent Kate Macer (Emily Blunt), who's recruited by flip-flop-wearing Matt Graver (Josh Brolin), a government task force official who tells her to observe as they "shake the trees and create chaos." Watching from the shadows is Benicio Del Toro's Alejandro, a consultant with a murky past and a personal agenda. Be prepared to take a shower when it's over. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Straight Outta Compton ★★★ F. Gary Gray's film burned up the box office, and why not? His chronicle of the five young men who rose above their upbringing in Compton, California, begins in 1987, but it captures the zeitgeist of the Black Lives Matter movement: The police who constantly drive through the frame, threatening to keep our young black heroes in their place, serves to remind us that as much as some things change, most things painfully remain the same. The cast is uniformly terrific in this portrayal of the rise of subversive "gangsta rap" group N.W.A.—made up of Ice Cube (O'Shea Jackson Jr., the real Ice Cube's son), Dr. Dre (Corey Hawkins), Eazy-E (Jason Mitchell), DJ Yella (Neil Brown Jr.) and MC Ren (Aldis Hodge)—who stand up to authority by creating angry anthems such as "Fuck tha Police," which Gray (Ice Cube's director in 1995's Friday) and his writers stage here as a direct response to the group nearly being arrested outside their recording studio simply for being black in the wrong place. Sure, the movie is hagiographic and overstuffed, but like the group, it's electric and not easily silenced. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Visit ★1/2 Some have hailed this movie as a return to form for writer/director M. Night Shyamalan, and he does return to his hoary old device of building a story backward from a late-movie revelation. But the real twist is that the man Newsweek once proclaimed "the next Spielberg" has simply given up. Working for Jason Blum, producer of the budget-rate Paranormal Activity pictures, Shyamalan finally forgoes his sense of craft, employing a variation on the "found footage" gimmick of those cheapies and the granddaddy of the genre, The Blair Witch Project, which just happened to open the week before his breakout success, 1999's The Sixth Sense. (You're a bit late to the party, M.) Nevertheless, Shyamalan does display his Spielberg-like gift for pulling strong performances out of young actors. Fifteen-year-old Becca and her younger brother, Tyler (Australian talents Olivia DeJonge and Ed Oxenbould), are sent by their single mom (Kathryn Hahn) to the remote Pennsylvania farm of the increasingly odd grandparents they've never met (Deanna Dunagan and Peter McRobbie). Budding filmmaker Becca and her bro document the week-long visit on video, and while they don't see dead people, they do see dirty adult diapers. We just see crap. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Walk ★★1/2 Someone's bound to take the 20-minute vertiginous sequence at the center of this latest movie from director Robert Zemeckis (Forrest Gump) and edit this titular walk into James Marsh's Oscar-winning 2008 documentary, Man on Wire. Both films focus on Philippe Petit, a Frenchman who, in 1974, dreamed of walking between the World Trade Center's twin towers on a high wire. Footage of this "artistic crime of the century" is all that's missing from Marsh's doc, which used still photos to illustrate the illegal feat. Zemeckis, who's frequently been better with technology than real people, beautifully recreates the tightrope routine in 3-D, using all of the CGI tools at his disposal. For instance, when Petit (played by Joseph Gordon-Levitt) takes a moment to lie back on the wire, a seagull flies into frame above him. It's a lovely image—and it's nearly ruined by the incessant chatter provided by Zemeckis and co-writer Christopher Browne's screenplay. Gordon-Levitt narrates most of the action in a Pepé Le Pew accent, which is matched by the unfortunately cartoonish-looking visual that bookends the film, as his Petit tells his tale from the Statue of Liberty's torch. Despite this, the movie stands as a stirring tribute to what we've lost. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

MUSIC

Edited by Sarah Hagman

JUNGLE HOOKS Glass Animals' Zaba is something of a head trip, though it's one that leads to a tropical paradise. The group recorded its 2014 debut—named after the adventure-filled children's book The Zabajaba Jungle—while holding tropics-inspired props like pineapples and Hawaiian leis. Those flourishes were the brainchild of Dave Bayley, who helms the atmospheric British pop quartet that caught the attention of mega-producer Paul Epworth (who's worked with the likes of Bloc Party, Coldplay and Adele). Beyond the bird calls and rustle of palm trees, listeners will catch hints of the frontman's neuroscience background and eclectic influences like Radiohead, Animal Collective and Dr. Dre—all adding up to the perfect escape. Go along for the ride at House of Blues on Oct. 17. / Sarah Hagman

MUSEUMS & GALLERIES

Edited by Sarah Hagman

MOTIVATIONAL PEEKING The last time someone called you a tightwad, it probably wasn't meant to be uplifting. In the Roaring '20s, it was a different story. This month, International Poster Gallery displays recently discovered motivational prints from Chicago printing firm Mather and Company, which took a page from the government's World War I poster campaign to boost workplace morale. Find slogans that once graced factory walls, like the aforementioned "Be a Tight Wad," "Hot Heads Never Do Cool Thinking," "Hoping Beats Moping" and the motto above, inspired by aviator Charles Lindbergh's pioneering 33-hour solo flight across the Atlantic. Find some encouragement at Who Said "Can't"?, on view through Nov. 15. | Sarah Hagman

SUSHI ANYONE?

What's not to love about a party that starts with cocktails in a mangrove swamp? Party for a Blue Planet, a fundraiser for the New England Aquarium, featured drinks in the Tropical Gallery, strolling dinner stations around the Giant Ocean Tank and raucous partying in a tent overlooking Boston Harbor. Even the seals seemed to enjoy themselves, frolicking nonstop while guests sipped, supped and danced the night away.

Present and accounted for: blond beauty Alyson Lindsey and her suspiciously tan other half, Jeff, board chair Donna Hazard, the delightful and delovely Jane Wolfson, head honcha Nigella Hillgarth, pharma bigwig David Altshuler, affable blue blood Ogden Hunnewell, silver fox Pamela Humphrey, the delightful Michelle and Andres Vilms, investment guru Alistair Lowe, the always sparkly Mary Renner, Prince Harry look-alike Bowman Hallagan and one guest who said, "I wonder if the penguins realize they're living in waterfront property rent-free?"

However, the evening's funniest remark came when one attendee said, "I always think it's weird that they serve seafood at these things," to which an Aquarium staffer responded, "Don't worry. We count the fish afterward."

LIVING LA DOLCE VITA

Q: What's more Italian than Italian?

A Fiat Cinquecento, complete with a cardboard cutout of the Pope, blessed the proceedings as guests sipped cocktails and watched sailboats glide past. Inside a tent, meanwhile, an Italian feast was served family-style to a high-octane crowd that included Italian consul general Nicola DeSantis, gaming mogul Alberto Fornaro, token Irish chicks Margery Eagan and Emily Rooney, soignée divorcee Jan Saragoni, incorrigible scamp Tony Nunziante, nightlife kingpin Patrick Lyons and the stunning Kristina, fashion royalty Yolanda Cellucci and her handsome husband, Dan, BSO babe Doreen Reis and former first lady Angela Menino, who gave out awards named for her late great husband.

The entire evening was molto bene, and the wine kept flowing into the wee hours, prompting one guest to say, "The best thing about Uber is that it takes away some of the stigma of getting drunk."

However, the evening's best exchange was as follows: "I might be Irish, but my dress is Armani," to which another guest responded, "I'm Italian by injection."

WHERE'S VAN MORRISON WHEN YOU NEED HIM?

It was a marvelous night for a Moondance, judging by the fact that the annual gala to support the Esplanade Association raised close to a million bucks.

The party, held beneath a tent next to the statue of Arthur Fiedler, began with cocktails served from a vintage Airstream trailer (note to self: I need one!) and continued with dinner and a live auction where one slightly inebriated guest asked, "They're auctioning off Bruins' wives?"

Prominent among the throng: blond bombshell Julia Owens, unfairly beautiful pair Liz and Peter Georgantas, Latin firecracker Yvette Lowenthal Mulderry and her handsome other half, Peter, bashful Adonis Tom Potter and his dapper husband, Dan Mathieu, the naturally carbonated Jodi Hess and her hubby, Hal, Back Bay party pair Steve and Jeryl Oristaglio, debonair developer Tony Pangaro and his stunning wife, Creelea, dazzling young things Lori and Matthew Sidman, Newbury Street royalty Judi Rotenberg and her sister, Jane Moss, the incomparable Audrey and James Foster, arts booster Dan Elias and his enchanting other half, Karen Keane, real estate magnate Christopher Egan and the lovely Jean, the effervescent Sue Brady Hartigan, ebony goddess Ingrid Calder, and so on and so forth down the line of A-listers.

For those who were still standing, there was dancing under the stars, and judging by the couple making out by the water, it was a fantabulous night to make romance 'neath the cover of September skies.

Overheard by the bar: "My husband said I had to choose between my wine glass and my auction paddle. Last year, I accidentally bought him a $10,000 watch." ◆

A MODEST PROPOSAL

IT RAINED ON THE DAY OF OUR MOST recent fashion shoot, which had Lydia Santangelo bringing gorgeous bridal gowns to Waltham's Lyman Estate, but rain is supposed to be good luck for a wedding. I think it may be lucky for a Wedding issue too, because we had a lot of fun with this one. Consider our cover subject, hilarious BC alum Cameron Esposito, who took time to chat with Jonathan Soroff while not only juggling film, TV and book projects, but getting ready to get hitched to fellow comic Rhea Butcher in December. (Good luck to the brave soul who attempts a funny toast at that reception.) Elsewhere, Nicole Popma dishes out wedding cake alternatives, from pie pops to ice cream sammies to tiered towers of mini donuts. (As Union Square Donuts' Josh Danoff helpfully pointed out, "You can't dance with cake"; donuts are far more dance-floor-friendly.) Meanwhile, Carley D. Thornell takes a look at the trend of tying the knot at campgrounds and other rustic locales, Alayna Eberhart rounds up some haute bridal headpieces, and Meghan Kavanaugh digs up DIY ideas for floral arrangements. Of course, there are plenty of non-nuptial finds in this issue, from Alexandra Cavallo's Q&A with Carly Rae Jepsen, who has a November gig in town, to my preview of a fab Halloween collab between Berklee and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether you're prepping for your own big day or just planning your weekend, I hope you find some inspiration here too.

BRIDAL BUNCH

GATHER YOUR BEST BUDS FOR A LESSON ON DIY BOUQUETS.

Building the Bouquet

Poised to replace "something new" faster than a seasoned bridesmaid can hot-glue lace to a mason jar, "something DIY" is a new benchmark for Pinterest-happy brides-to-be. But when it comes to the flowers for a ceremony or reception, some professional oversight can help. "It just takes the edge off," says Alice Rossiter, local founder of the recently launched Alice's Table, a floral arrangement class service that hosts private how-to's for bridal parties and showers, charity galas and book clubs, as well as $65-per-person public events at bars. The 90-minute classes include step-by-step instruction and a cocktail pairing, plus an arrangement and vase for each guest to take home. Rossiter, who also offers premade deliveries and has DIY kit deliveries in the works, says that the goal is to have attendees have fun while learning a new skill. "The whole business is about spreading joy," she says. "It's assisted DIY." / Meghan Kavanaugh

On Choosing Flowers

"Hydrangeas are my favorite flower, mostly because you get a lot of coverage for one stem of hydrangeas. ... Hydrangeas are expensive, but they are the same price as a rose, so I'd rather have that coverage and throw in two roses."

On Presentation

"We use the English hand-tie technique. ... It's the bridal bouquet in a vase. Most people in the U.S. think a bridal bouquet is only for a bridal bouquet, but really, they look beautiful in a vase. And it's an easy way to quickly arrange."

On Staying Power

"The way to kill your flowers the fastest is to leave the leaves in the water. The leaves are down in the water, which means that bacteria grows, and that kills them. ... And plant food is there for a reason; you should use it."

BLOOM BOOM

Alice's Table is far from the only way to learn how to make a beautiful bouquet. Check out some of the other arranging classes that have been sprouting up across the city.

PLANT NITE
Sister to the popular Paint Nite events, Plant Nite follows the same vino-fueled creativity model with its succulent garden design classes. They sell out fast, so book early and plan for a special Thanksgiving centerpiece class on Nov. 16 at Central Wharf Co.

ORLY KHON FLORAL
In addition to hosting private design workshops for succulents and special events, Orly Khon (The Improper's 2015 pick for Boston's Best Florist) is offering a Fall Foliage class on Nov. 4 and a Thanksgiving Table how-to on Nov. 17.

SQUARE ROOTS

Parsnip
91 Winthrop St., Cambridge
(617-714-3206)
parsniprestauront.com

THERE'S NO SPECIFIC RECIPE FOR following in the footsteps of a beloved restaurant, but there are plenty of recent examples of new eateries shining in cherished local spaces. Slated to open in Harvard Square in early November, Parsnip hopes to join those ranks when it replaces quirky treasure UpStairs on the Square.

Gone is most evidence of UpStairs' hot pink and zebra stripes, replaced by a warm space with clean lines. The downstairs 80-seat dining room has a V-shaped marble bar on one side and a marble fireplace on the other. Upstairs, the 50-seat lounge has a darker feel, with an intricate wood-paneled ceiling, fireplaces on both sides of the room and a similar V-shaped bar.

"It's kind of a juxtaposition between the two floors, with a play on light and dark," says general manager Ian Rose. "The overall feeling of what we're trying to accomplish here is not something new, but rather something classic and timeless."

Diners can expect that feel to be mirrored by cuisine from executive chef Peter Quinion, an Englishman who's new to the area. The menu will reflect his European training and change daily, even if the difference is minimal, such as swapping in a vegetable in a protein-centric dish.

"There's not a lot of ingredients to a plate. If you've got a superior ingredient, it would be a shame to add that one or two extra items to the plate that overshadow the inherent flavor of something," Rose says. "So if you're going to get ginger and lemongrass in a plate, it's going to be just that. It's not sort of a patchwork of other flavors."

The dining room menu will be split into traditional appetizer/entree sections with an option for a five-course tasting. The food in the upstairs lounge will be more casual, but there will be some carryover from downstairs: While the dining room menu might offer a filet steak with turnips, beets and bone-marrow fritters, those bone-marrow fritters will be served as a snack upstairs alongside a garlicky pesto sauce. Cocktails from bar manager Steven Lemley, an award-winning bartender from New Orleans, will accompany the lounge's small plates, and a dozen beers as well as 60 to 70 largely Old World wines will be available.

While Rose has observed the constant rush outside on JFK Street and been part of a rush inside to get Parsnip opened, he's looking forward to helping people push pause when they enter the restaurant.

"I'm trying to slow things down a bit. Even the time I would allocate to a reservation might be a little bit more than I've done for bistros in the past," says Rose, formerly of Ten Tables. "I've always thought of the restaurant industry as being a bit of an oasis to a world that's grown less personal and is moving faster."

Good Eats: A Strong Link

Friday's pork sausage sub closes out the weekday rotation of meaty sandwiches that Capone's serves for lunch, a program the Union Square market introduced this summer. The housemade link, classically seasoned with black pepper and fennel, stands out from the typical peppers-and-onions profile thanks to its combo of Italian and Spanish fixin's: chimichurri, good olive oil, melted provolone and slabs of sweet piquillo peppers, all stuffed onto Clear Flour's rustic Italian bread. Like Monday's slow-cooked pork ribs and Tuesday's meatballs, this sandwich sells out, so make sure to get there on the early side of the 11 am–2 pm block. / Elizabeth Bomze

A healthy lifestyle involves more than the occasional bowl of kale, as industry leaders gathering for the inaugural W.E.L.L. Summit will tell you. Here, some participating experts share little changes for more wholesome living before making their way to the Wyndham Boston on Nov. 6-8. / Sarah Hagman

When Gianne Doherty's go-to products started making her break out in hives, her boyfriend offered to whip up organic body butter. That led her to research the mainstream beauty industry ("I found much more than I bargained for"), launch skin care line Organic Bath Co. and, now, spearhead the conference.

Her tip: Oil up. "Don't be afraid of organic oils! You can do so much with them: Clean your face, moisturize your skin, tame hair flyaways. So many people shy away from oils because they're afraid of breakouts. But the truth is, high-quality oils attract other oils—lifting excess oil, dirt and makeup away for soft, clean skin."

As a beauty editor, Jolene Hart had access to products and treatments that promised to clear acne and eczema, but it wasn't until she changed her diet that she uncovered the real culprit. "I wanted to bring nutrition to the conversation about beauty," says the health coach and author of Eat Pretty, "because it was totally absent."

Her tip: Take a coffee break. "Coffee does pack a lot of antioxidants, but its caffeine is often a Band-Aid for other energy and blood sugar issues. Caffeine interferes with the absorption of important beauty minerals like zinc, iron and calcium, and suppresses the production of the happiness-boosting neurotransmitter serotonin."

Emily Griffin once struggled with digestive and energy issues, but notes, "I felt such a positive shift in my body and mindset after I started to practice yoga." The Prana Power Yoga instructor and Down Under Yoga faculty member is also a practitioner of Ayurveda, which she credits with helping her regain a healthy balance.

Her tip: Pencil yourself in. "Take 10 minutes to do one of two things: During a lunch break, take a brisk walk around the block, or choose your favorite relaxing yoga pose before bed to be still, close your eyes and let your body calm down. Either way, shut off your phone and focus on even breaths. You can even use counts... inhale 1-2-3, exhale 3-2-1."

Drink of the Moment

MARY IN THE LIBRARY

WHAT'S WITH THE NAME? "I don't think I can have that in print," says bar manager Michael Ray, adding that you'll have to pay him a visit to hear the story—which you should. Summertime tipplers may have come to the Envoy Hotel's Lookout rooftop bar for the view, but you'll stay downstairs at Outlook for the cocktails.

INGREDIENTS: Privateer amber rum, Pimm's No.1, orange marmalade serum, lime juice, mole bitters

OUTLOOK KITCHEN AND BAR AT THE ENVOY HOTEL
70 Sleeper St., Boston
(617-338-3030)
theenvoyhotel.com

TRY IT IF YOU LIKE: "A vodka cocktail that's on the sweeter side," Ray says. "It definitely works well toward the end of your night."

TASTE: Not as sweet as you'd think. The chocolate bitters tone it down, and the marmalade adds brightness. "When I first tasted this drink—I grew up in England—it reminded me of during the holidays when you would get a chocolate-covered orange," Ray explains. There's a nod to his English heritage with the Pimm's, which adds subtle fruit notes.

PAIR IT WITH: Something savory, like the smoked bacon flatbread ($12), topped with figs, caramelized onion and Valdeon cheese.

THE FINISHING TOUCH: A candied orange rind dipped in chocolate—dunk it in the cocktail before eating. The garnish was created with the help of pastry chef Kim Darisse, who's collaborated with the bar staff on other concoctions, including one featuring julienned peach smoked in a mason jar. Says Ray, "I'm always trying to steal her mind." / Sarah Hagman

a xtended interview

Carly Rae Jepsen was an unknown name until 2012, when Justin Bieber uploaded a YouTube video of himself and a gang of friends, including Selena Gomez and Ashley Tisdale, dancing to an infectious pop song called "Call Me Maybe." Now, she's worked with Tom Hanks, performed on SNL and just released her third studio album, E·MO·TION, an '80s-vibing piece of pop perfection that's been almost universally lauded by critics. We caught up with Jepsen before her stop in town for a gig at the Paradise Rock Club on Nov. 10. / Alexandra Cavallo

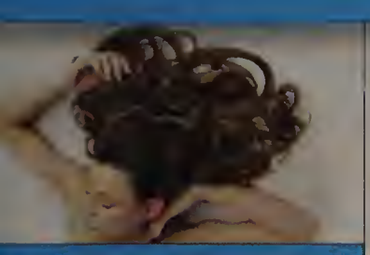
DID YOU HAVE ANY IDEA THAT "CALL ME MAYBE" VIDEO WOULD GO VIRAL LIKE THAT? No, the whole thing was a complete shock to me. The first time he posted the video, I had to call my sister Katie—I was in such a state of "No!" and was like "Can you just go on my Facebook? Someone linked me in a video and he looks so much like Justin Bieber, but I don't know. It couldn't be him; that's crazy." And she called me back, and she was hysterical. And I was like "OK, I guess that means yes. Holy shit."

YOU DIDN'T KNOW HE WAS UPLOADING IT? No! The idea was just so crazy to me. I'd never met him before; I was obviously aware of who he was, but it was a complete shock. A couple weeks after that, Katy Perry put one out, and then James Franco, and they just started coming in more and more. And the exciting thing for me, always wanting to kind of break out of Canada, was that they were coming from different countries. And it was like "Oh my gosh!" It was really strange, but incredible.

BE HONEST: HOW MANY TIMES HAVE YOU HAD TO DEAL WITH SOMEONE ASKING YOU TO CALL THEM, MAYBE? [Laughs] Well, it was funny because after "I Really Like You" came out, it kind of switched over. And then all the jokes changed from "Call me maybe!" to me being like "Oh, I really like this drink" and them being like "But do you really really really really really like it?" And I was like "All right—I made my bed!"

HOW DID TOM HANKS END UP BEING IN THE MUSIC VIDEO FOR "I REALLY LIKE YOU"? It's shocking even to me, to be honest. I think even on the day we went to film that, I was just feeling like "This isn't really happening, is it? This is crazy." The first little bug of inspiration came from reading a whole bunch of different treatments [for the video] and deciding, oh my gosh, it would be really fun, because the song is sort of sweet and on the lighter side, to have somebody really unexpected and quirky singing the song instead of me and make it a little sort of absurd. We had a whole list of people that we thought would suit the role ... but nothing had been solidified yet, and then Scooter [my manager] went to dinner with Tom Hanks—he's friends with him, if you could imagine that—and was talking to him about this concept. And then he told me, "Tom Hanks is in!"

IS HE AS NICE IN PERSON AS HE SEEMS? He's even nicer. My joke is that he's like real-life Santa Claus. [Laughs.] Not really, but he's just so giving, and he did this video for free and gave us all his time on the coldest day in New York that I've lived through and was just ready to do as many takes as we needed and was dancing around and into it. I love that he doesn't take himself seriously. It was obviously not a super stressful shoot for me, so I was just in my trailer with my hot chocolate being like "One more time!"



BERKLEE'S GOT BITE

Count Orlok must be rolling in his coffin: This summer, it was announced that 1922 horror classic Nosferatu was next in line to receive a likely redundant remake. But Bostonians can catch the original ur-vampire flick—complete with a spankin'-new score—when Nosferatu*: A Symphony of Horror hits Symphony Hall on Oct. 30. Marking the first time the Boston Pops have accompanied a feature-length silent film, the performance features music composed by eight students in Berklee's Scoring Silent Films course. "The goal of the score is that the audience will not know where one person's reel ends and another person's begins," says professor Sheldon Mirowitz, who teaches the course and leads the Berklee Silent Film Orchestra. It's their 10th and most ambitious silent film project, one that taps instruments little seen at Symphony Hall, like a theremin and a Moog System 55 Modular Synthesizer, for a landmark collaboration. "We're going to have one of the greatest orchestras in the world performing our music," Mirowitz says. "We've graduated to a whole different level of awesomeness." / Jacqueline Houton

Nosferatu: A Symphony of Horror* starts at 8 pm on Oct. 30 at Symphony Hall, 301 Mass. Ave., Boston. Tickets are $37–$47 at bso.org.

RIDING AWAY FROM PAIN

A LOCAL WRITER RECOUNTS HOW SHE OVERCAME A HARROWING PAST WITH HELP FROM AN EQUINE FRIEND.

Let the Tornado Come* by Rita Zoey Chin
Published by Simon & Schuster, 336 pages, $16

IT'S FASCINATING, WHILE READING A MEMOIR involving family violence, to wonder how a child rose from the floor of degradation to write about it so lyrically. Starting at age 11, scared, brave and reckless Rita repeatedly fled her parents' abuse and became a runaway, connecting with dangerous men and using drugs. Her survival involved ill-gotten money, stripping and stints on the streets and in various corrective lockups for teens. As an adult, she values the darkly adventurous powers she had in those early days, even as she evolves into a sensitive writer, earns an MFA and marries a calm neurosurgeon.

But then, post-traumatic panic attacks bubble up into her new peaceful life. Paralyzed in everyday tasks, she describes her body as feeling "like a guitar in the hands of a child—plucked and smacked and thrumming." And when she tries cognitive behavioral therapy, she only finds herself feeling worse. These wild waves of misery lead her to horses, which become her lifesaver. After months of riding lessons, she develops a sympathetic connection with Claret, a 1,400-pound chestnut whose own anxieties and vulnerability serendipitously echo her own. Gradually, they develop a kind of mutual therapy; she gets the help she needs by giving it to him. Throughout, Chin's various selves make for riveting reading.

FROM PAGE 150: After I cantered with Rascal, all I wanted to do was canter. When I wasn't cantering, I was often talking about cantering. "It's amazing," I kept telling Larry. "It's like this great rush. It's better than any drug. Maybe even better than sex."

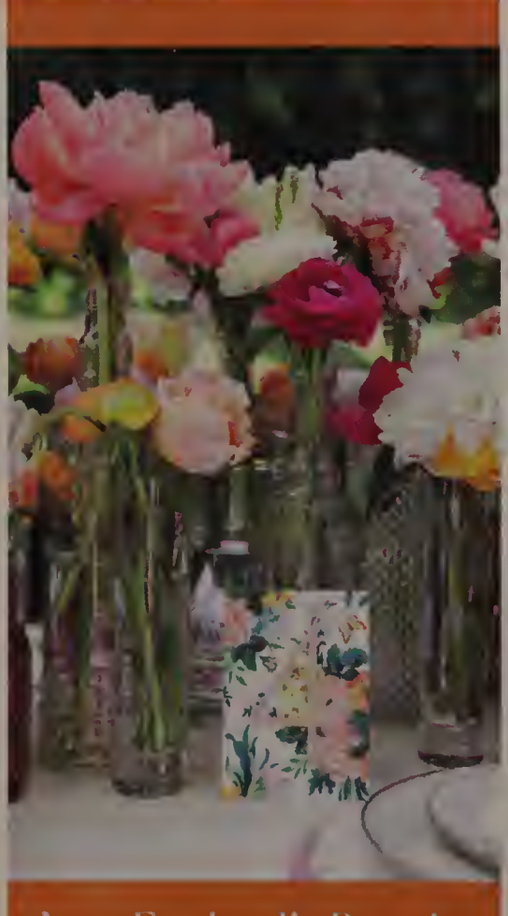
"Hmmm," said Larry, furrowing his forehead.

"It's so free—it's like the opposite of panic. It's powerful and graceful and even a bit clumsy all at once. It's like—"

"It's like you," he said.



And it was sweet, what he said, but not entirely true, because panic was also like me... ◆

INTO THE WILD

WANDER FARTHER AFIELD OF SEATTLE TO EXPLORE WASHINGTON'S NATURAL WONDERS.

THERE'S A REASON BESTSELLER-TURNED-blockbuster Twilight was set in Washington state. Marked by sweeping mountain vistas, thick with towering pines that brood beneath a heavy cap of fog, the landscape is almost otherworldly in its beauty. That beauty is on full display (and blessedly free of sparkly vampires) at the picturesque Suncadia Resort in the town of Cle Elum, set an hour and a half from Seattle. Tucked amid more than 6,000 acres of pristine forest, the five-time Four Diamond-winning resort offers a variety of accommodations—guests can stay in the main lodge or the homier inn or rent a house or condo for a longer stay. But all of the lodgings are outfitted in rustic-chic decor, marked by dark wood and masculine yet elegant flourishes.

Amenities abound at Suncadia, from an on-property winery to an ultra-luxe spa boasting four hot outdoor mineral baths, but you'd do best to take full advantage of the resort's natural resources. Book a river float with outdoorsman Jim Gallagher of Troutwater Fly, a local fly fishing shop owner who'll serve as your captain, guide and personal chef on a lazy float down the Yakima, a winding stretch of river flanked on all sides by mountains and ubiquitous fir trees. Some sections feel remote enough to remind one of the prettier scenes from Deliverance; fortunately the friendly locals you'll encounter around various bends in the river bear no such resemblance. The raft is stocked with local wines and brews (like tall cans of Iron Horse Brewery's Finger Gun IPA), but save some room for lunch. Gallagher will stop on a sandy stretch of beach to prepare a riverside feast of grilled wild salmon, couscous, potato salad, fresh fruit and veggies, and cheese and crackers before you're picked up by the resort's van and shuttled back to Suncadia.

Work off the lunchtime spread with a brisk hike around the property—or brave the steep 1,000 steps that lead from the main lodge down to the Cle Elum River. That way you'll earn your dinner at the hotel's Portals restaurant, which puts a refined touch on rustic local flavors and serves its fare family-style. The roasted Brussels sprouts are a must, and many of the dishes contain vegetables from the on-property Nelson Farm. Once a dairy farm, it's now part of a historical preserve, which also features community gardens and a two-story farmhouse and barn that can be booked for special events. End your evening with a nightcap on the lodge's stone terrace, where you can watch the setting sun paint the Cascade Mountains before revealing a night sky so free of light pollution that every constellation shines in bright detail.

Prefer your nature a wee bit closer to civilization? Suncadia sister property the Woodmark Hotel may be more your speed. You can catch a ride there from downtown Seattle with Captain Rob, who shuttles guests to the resort aboard the Woodmark II, a handsome mahogany-appointed vessel that comes stocked with a yet another cooler of ice-cold local brews (like Pike Brewing Company's Naughty Nellie, a crisp golden ale). Throughout the roughly 45-minute trip, Captain Rob directs passengers' attention to the houseboats and floating homes that line Lake Union—some shambling and quaint a la Sleepless in Seattle, some strikingly modern and luxurious—as well as points of interest like the University of Washington's lakeside Husky Stadium and Bill Gates' massive compound, the latter of which is just visible from behind a protective shade of trees as the boat crosses into Lake Washington.

Once settled at the Woodmark, be sure to book a trip on the hotel's seaplane, a four-seat craft that offers the intrepid unparalleled birds-eye views of both Lake Washington and Seattle sights like the Space Needle. Guests can book 20-minute or hourlong flights, though 20 minutes is ample time for a tour, which, while exhilarating, can prove a bit daunting for passengers with weak stomachs. Alternatively, you can explore Lake Washington on your own; kayaks, stand-up paddleboards and jet skis are available for rent from the hotel's dock during warmer months. Landlubbers can opt to rent a bike or take a leisurely stroll to downtown Kirkland, a bustling harbor town that, while replete with touristy shops and eateries, is also home to many yearlong residents, keeping resort town kitsch at bay. Those with no athletic inclinations can book an hour—or an afternoon—at the Still Spa, an oasis of therapeutic tranquility with a buffet of amenities including massages with a custom blend of oils or lotions.

After working up an appetite, hit the casual Beach Cafe to nosh on coconut curry hummus and smoked jerk chicken wings while enjoying lakeside views from the patio or, in inclement weather, through the restaurant's large picture windows. When it comes to dining, however, a stay at the Woodmark is incomplete without a dinner at the elegant Bin on the Lake, where chef Matthew Steffen's fare is as delicious as the sunsets—another showcase of Washington's natural majesty that will have you longing to extend your stay. No wonder Bella wanted to linger here forever. ◆

CHILACATES
224 Amory St., Boston

MEXICAN CUISINE ENJOYED A SURGE in Boston a few years ago, with a dozen upscale, decidedly Yanqui-fied places suddenly appearing in our fanciest neighborhoods. You know the type: eight dozen tequilas behind the bar, chichi atmosphere, tacos clocking in at nine bucks a throw. They have their uses: Tourists and conventioneers seem to love them, and they're popular date-night spots. But for lovers of more traditional Mexican fare, any venue swank enough to host a bachelorette party feels a bit ersatz. Spend enough time in the modest Mexican-owned taquerias of Eastie and Waltham, and you develop an itch that no $14 Naughty Pineapple Margarita can scratch. For those afflicted with that yearning, merciful relief has arrived in the form of Chilacates, a pocket-sized joint in Jamaica Plain that delivers the real Mexican deal at easy everyday prices.

Tacos ($2.99 each) are the essential starting point here, tacos al pastor a useful benchmark. The "shepherd's taco" emerged from the kitchens of Lebanese-Mexicans adapting their homeland's shawarma to local ingredients, subbing pork for lamb, corn tortilla for pita. In Boston it is rare to see a trompo, the canonical stack of pork loin cuts and pineapple slices on a spit, rotating against the heat of a vertical rotisserie, but that's how Chilacates makes its taco al pastor. Tiny slices of tender, crisp-edged pork and grilled pineapple are piled atop another local rarity: a palm-sized housemade tortilla with real corn flavor. Garnished with fresh cilantro, diced raw white onions and shredded radishes, it can be dolloped with fabulous housemade fresh salsas of tomatillo and roasted red chili.

Other filling options are similarly vivid and satisfying. They include the garlicky sliced steak of carne asada, the complexly spiced stew of shredded chicken breast and smoky chipotles in chicken tinga, tiny diced potatoes and crumbled pork sausage in papas con chorizo, slow-braised marinated pork shoulder in carnitas, diced braised beef tongue in lengua, grilled chicken and a seasonal veggie option, featuring zucchini, poblano peppers and corn on one visit. If you want to get fancy for an extra 99 cents, there are Baja-influenced tacos of crisp grilled cod and nicely browned grilled shrimp ($3.98 each). With all the evident hand-crafted care packed into them, these might be the tastiest tacos in the city at any price, full stop.

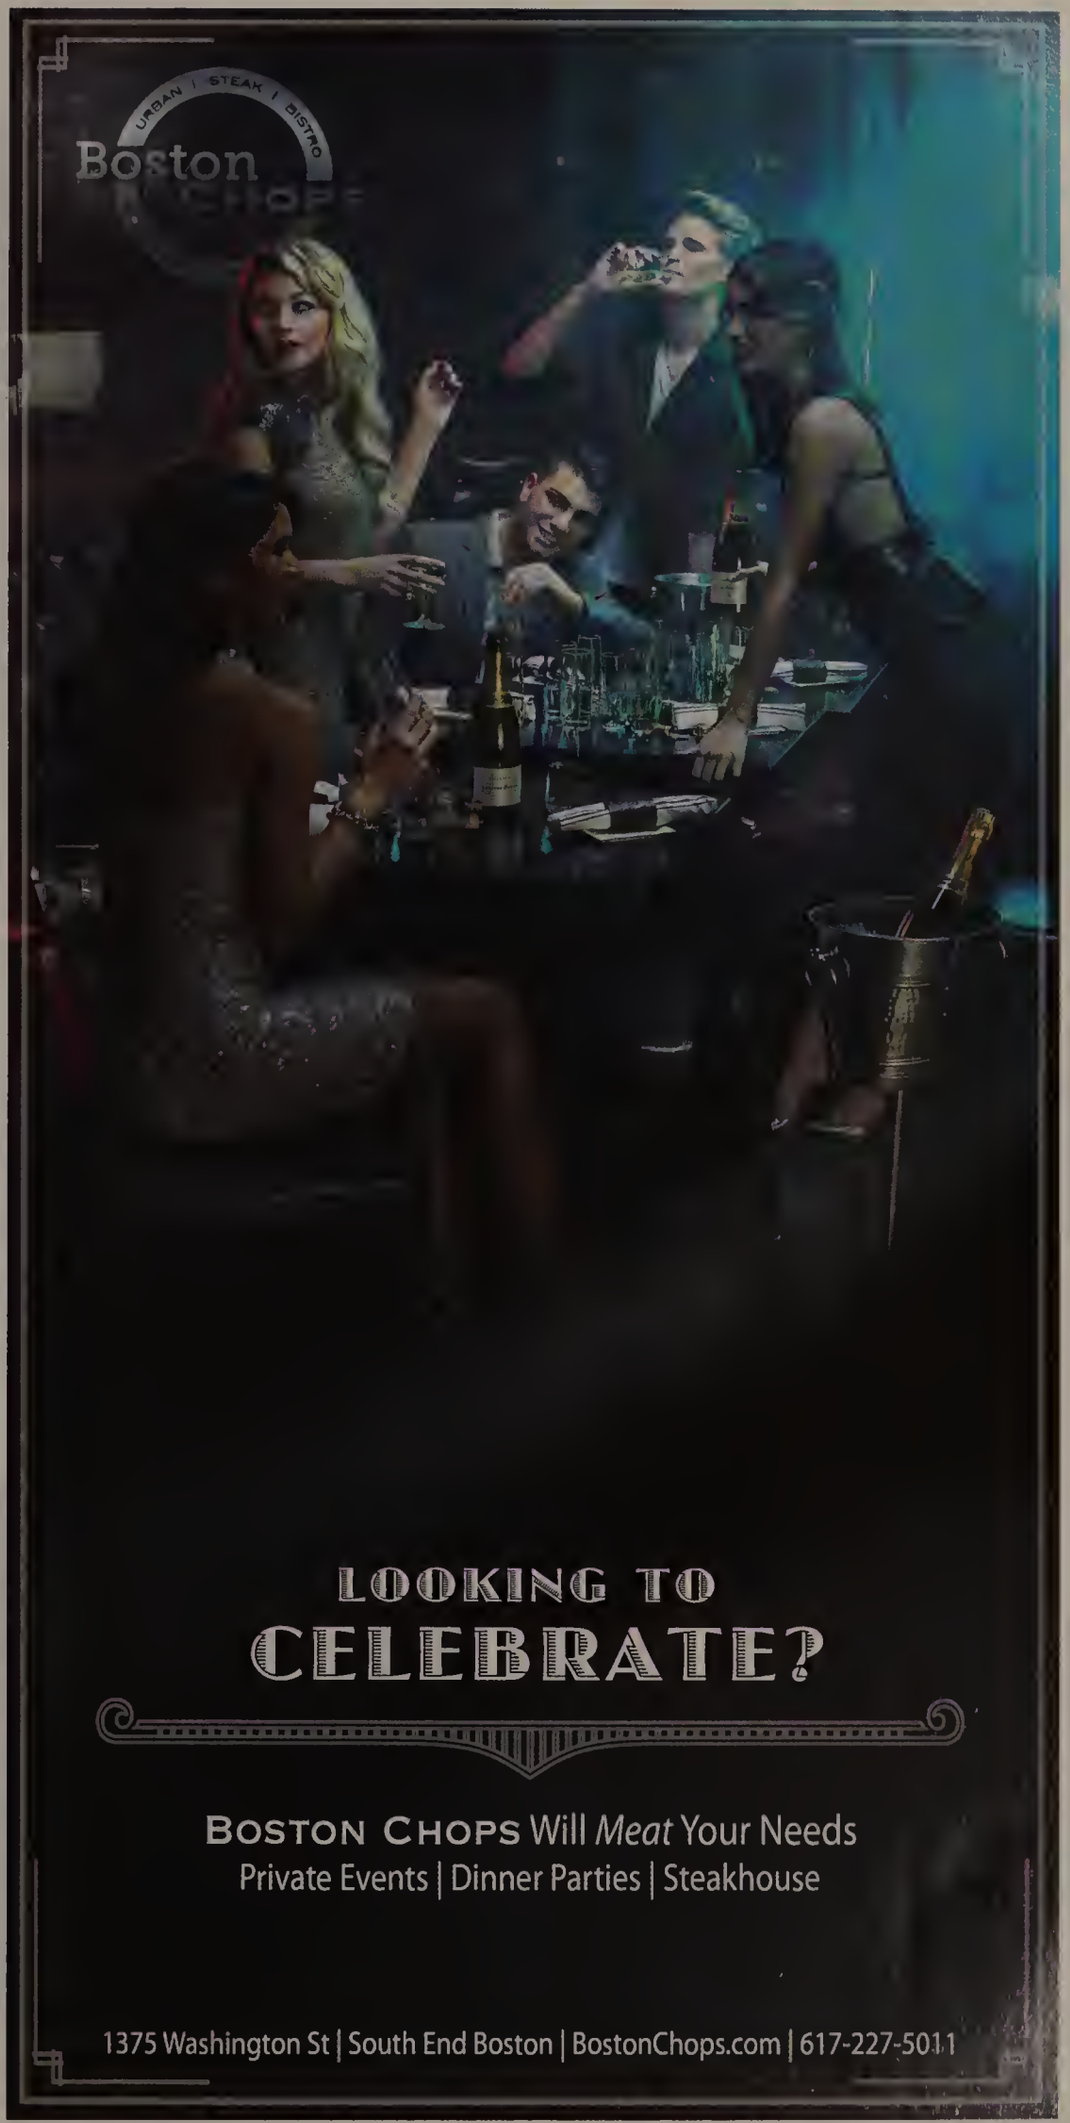
Those 10 filling options are also available in the quesadilla ($8.50-$9.50), featuring lots of melty jack cheese and served with sides of fresh pico de gallo and guacamole; the torta ($8.50), a sandwich dressed with avocado, jack cheese and jalapeño mayo that benefits mightily from a terrific, slightly oily, toasted telera roll from a Chelsea bakery; and the substantial burrito ($5.99-$7.50), whose big flour tortillas—another rare ingredient not made in-house—are bulked up with rice, black beans, cheese and pico de gallo.



Chilacates does an excellent version of the street-food staple that is elotes ($2.99). At that gentle price, you get a full ear of corn, grilled soft to nearly blackened sweetness, coated with mayo and fresh lime juice, sprinkled generously with the dry aged cow cheese cotija and dusted with a little dried ground chili. Other side options ($2.99 each) include rice and simply stewed black beans, as well as excellent fresh guacamole (95 cents). Housemade tamales ($2.99 each) with scant fillings of cheese with roasted chilies, green-chili chicken or red-chili pork, are mild, crumbly and filling, best when arriving fresh from the steamer.

Beverage options from the cooler include bottles of candy-colored Jarritos sodas ($2.25). Housemade, cinnamon-heavy horchata and sweet/tart agua fresca de jamaica (hibiscus flower) and tamarind (all $1.99) are big and refreshing. Desserts include flan ($4), a generous hunk of firm egg custard with a thin caramel sauce. The sunny counter-service space is brightly decorated (hola, Frida Kahlo) and given additional warmth by the irrepressible good humor and hospitality of omnipresent owner and longtime JP resident Socrates Abreu. But with a mere 10 stools lining a perimeter countertop, dining-in quarters can be tight; many customers do takeout. This tiny, humble neighborhood spot may ultimately not rank as destination dining for most folks from outside JP. But for any Bostonian with warm memories of wandering off the beaten path in the Yucatan, or standing over the hood of a car eating $2 truck tacos in Los Angeles, Chilacates feels like a godsend. ◆

Q: I HAVE ACNE SCARS ON MY CHEEKS. MY GIRLFRIEND SAID SHE USED TO HAVE ACNE SCARS, BUT HAD THEM REMOVED WITH FRACTIONAL LASER TREATMENTS. CAN YOU TELL ME ABOUT THAT?

CHERYL CLARKSON
M.S., Massachusetts Institute of Technology
CEO & Founder
SkinHealth Centers

A: Yes, fractional laser is an extremely effective way of reducing and/or eliminating acne scars, as well as other types of scars elsewhere on the body. Energy pulses from this specialized fractional laser break down and destroy scar tissue, activating new cell growth. Fresh, healthy skin replaces the scar tissue.

Fractional laser has other uses as well. It can also successfully remove stretch marks from pregnancy or changes in your weight. Melasma, which is a discoloration of the skin, can be treated with fractional laser treatments; and it is also very helpful for softening or eliminating fine lines and wrinkles.

At SkinHealth we have years of experience with fractional laser and would love to have you come in for a consultation.

ROOM ★★★★

Movies / Brett Michel

JACOB TREMBLAY AND BRIE LARSON PROVE THERE'S ALWAYS ROOM FOR GREAT ACTING.

Adapting Room, her acclaimed 2010 novel, Irish-born Emma Donoghue has remarkably been able to keep her book's point of view mostly intact. With few exceptions, her screenplay is seen through the eyes of Jack (Jacob Tremblay), an imaginative 5-year-old who could easily be mistaken for a girl with the long chestnut hair that hangs down his back. Jack acts as the novel's narrator, and Donoghue was smart to recognize that her young protagonist's nascent grasp of English wouldn't work well in extended voiceover—especially in a medium that exceeds in showing rather than telling—but even so, she deploys it expertly.

Indeed, the first voice we hear is that of Jack, who opens director Lenny Abrahamson's film with the words "Once upon a time..." But this is no fairy tale we're about to witness; it's more of a prolonged nightmare, one that began seven years earlier for Jack's "Ma" (Brie Larson), who has nevertheless been able to raise a wonderful child in the most horrific of situations.

As in the novel, we enter this inseparable pair's story on Jack's 5th birthday. Although they don't have much, Ma is determined that they make a cake together to celebrate the occasion. Jack, however, grows upset that it's not a "real" birthday cake, since it's not topped with candles. He lashes out, but his loving mother patiently embraces him, calming him as she pulls him close. But then, they're forced to be close no matter what, given their living situation, which finds the two inhabiting a windowless, electronically locked 10-by-10-foot space. Other than a single lamp, there's only a small skylight on the unreachable ceiling to provide a modicum of light. Unsurprisingly, they both suffer from a ghostlike pallor, with dark circles lining their eyes. Nevertheless, Jack has a genuine spark in his, which widen as he begins his daily ritual of wishing a "good morning" to every object in "Room," as Ma has dubbed the only world Jack has ever known. Bounding from "Lamp" to "Sink," "TV" to "Brush," Jack shows an exuberance that contrasts with his mother's resignation to her fate, just as Jack's colorful drawings jump out against the filthy chipboard wall paneling.

But this is no fairy tale we're about to witness; it's more of a prolonged nightmare...

As if this backyard shack—a tiny prison with little more than a mattress, a bathtub, a toilet and a sink—weren't cramped enough, Ma is visited nightly by their captor, a man known only as Old Nick. The first time we see the bearded, disheveled man in out-of-style eyeglasses, he delivers their "Sunday treats" of clothing, food and household items—before he removes his pants and climbs on top of Ma, as Jack peers through the horizontal slats on the doors to "Wardrobe," which serves as the boy's makeshift bed and refuge when Old Nick pays his nocturnal visits. Jack, too young to realize what's happening to his mom at the hands of the man we gradually realize is his father by blood only, tallies the man's thrusts as though he's counting sheep.

Ma doesn't want Jack to know there's an entire world beyond Room's walls; to him, Room is the world. And as far as Jack knows, Old Nick might be about as "real" as Dora the Explorer on the television—until Jack's curiosity gets the better of him and he comes face-to-face with the all-too-real demon in their dwelling.

As Ma tears her son away from Old Nick, the man becomes violently angry, ranting about how difficult it is for him to provide for them when he's been laid off for six months, screaming that "there are no jobs!" So, it comes as little surprise when the electricity and heat cease working. With winter upon them, Ma knows something must be done.

Jack is rereading Alice's Adventures in Wonderland when Ma decides to end the charade and tell the unbelieving boy about the larger world. "I wasn't always in Room. I was a little girl named Joy—like Alice." And Joy has had enough. She begins formulating a plan to free them from captivity, one that—if successful—will find Jack entering a rabbit hole that exits into reality, like an inverse of Alice's Wonderland.

Dublin-born Abrahamson is an old hand at working within constraints, having confined Michael Fassbender in a massive papier-mâché mask that completely concealed the talented actor's head as he portrayed the titular character of Frank, the director's low-key film from last year. However, there's no concealing the award-worthy performances of 9-year-old Tremblay, a relative newcomer, and the 26-year-old Larson, who impresses with every new project. Likewise, Joan Allen delivers some fine work in the latter part of the picture, but it's the believable bond between the two leads and their wholly naturalistic performances that elevates the film past any narrative deficiencies into greatness.

Sure, Stephen Rennicks' musical score may push a little too hard, and Abrahamson might not have found the most interesting visual dynamic for introducing the "outside side" of Room, as Jack perfectly articulates it. But these things have little effect on the cumulative power of the film, or the room you'll need in your pockets for Kleenex. ◆

SOUL SISTERS: Partnering with artists such as Joan Osborne (right) keeps 76-year-old Mavis Staples feeling young

SOUL SUMMIT

A GOSPEL LEGEND GRABS A NEW PARTNER FOR HER LATEST TOUR.

SOLID SOUL: MAVIS STAPLES AND JOAN OSBORNE play the Berklee Performance Center on Nov. 7.

Mavis Staples reigns as a gospel-soul icon. Yet the 76-year-old singer continues to embrace opportunities to collaborate with younger musicians.

She's enlisted such producers as Wilco's Jeff Tweedy, who guided her Grammy-winning 2010 album You Are Not Alone, and hip-hop savant Son Little, who joins her on her recent EP Your Good Fortune. She sang alongside Tweedy, Lucius and Lake Street Dive at 2014's Newport Folk Festival. And on September's debut of The Late Show with Stephen Colbert, she led a largely young cast that included Susan Tedeschi, Derek Trucks and Alabama Shakes' Brittany Howard through Sly and the Family Stone's "Everyday People."

So it's not surprising that Staples has teamed with Joan Osborne for the Solid Soul tour that hits the Berklee Performance Center on Nov. 7. "I'm up for trying new things," says the Chicago native, who toured with the North Mississippi Allstars on a Solid Blues bill in 2007. "I've been working since the '50s, but feel young though. And these partnerships keep me that way. It keeps it fresh."

Staples grew up with collaboration as a member of the Staple Singers, a church-bred family group that she shared with her siblings and her father Roebuck "Pops" Staples. He befriended the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., and the group gave a musical voice to the civil rights movement of the '60s. "That's what the Staple Singers have always been about, singing songs of inspiration, being informative and positive," Staples says. "We want to give you a reason to get up in the morning—something that can help the world and help the people."

Staples says she tries to uphold that legacy as a solo artist and cites her father's words: "What comes from the heart reaches the heart. So if you sing from your heart, you will reach people."

Osborne was one of those people. She recalls driving home to Kentucky from her college in New York and hitting a truck stop where she bought a cassette tape of the Staple Singers' early gospel music.

"I've been working since the '50s, but feel young. ...These partnerships keep me that way."

"It had this ethereal, hypnotic quality to it," Osborne, 53, says from her Brooklyn home. "Driving through the night on these twisting roads in West Virginia with the music on, it was like being in a trance."

Now Osborne gets to sing with her hero. After separate sets backed by Staples' band, the two singers unite—usually for Staple Singers classics or standards such as "Will the Circle Be Unbroken" or the Band's "The Weight," which Staples famously sang in the concert film The Last Waltz.

"It's just been a joy," Osborne says of working with Staples. "She's like a force of nature. She gets out there and rocks the house every night." And the admiration is mutual. "Oh, we have been having big fun," Staples says. "Joan is my soul sister."

Osborne also has traversed blues, rock, pop and country across her career, which now includes the band Trigger Hippy with Black Crowes drummer Steve Gorman. She's still best known for her 1995 hit "One of Us" (featuring the lyric "What if God was one of us, just a slob like one of us") and sings it every night to fulfill audience expectations. "If you're going to have one pop song to be identified with, that's a pretty interesting one," she says. "It's better than a shake-your-groove thing."

For her part, Staples still performs Staple Singers favorites "I'll Take You There" and "Respect Yourself." And she again quotes her father's advice: "You don't need to dance and jump around or sing as loud as you can," an easy proposition with a husky, instantly recognizable voice like hers.

"I've always had a heavy voice," Staples says, noting that back in the '50s, "People would actually bet money that the part wasn't no 15-year-old girl. That either had to be a man or a fat lady. Now my voice is still strong, I think, as I am singing in a lower key. But I do need to rest my voice after flying or on the day of a show. And I drink my tea and use honey loquat too—especially in Boston, where it's cold!" ◆

MY ATTEMPT TO FEEL INVESTED IN DAILY FANTASY FOOTBALL.

A LOT OF PEOPLE, SOME OF THEM IN the FBI, are wondering what the difference is between daily fantasy football and gambling. As a prize-winning investigative journalist (I was recently awarded three Tootsie Rolls by an arcade claw machine), I decided to go undercover and infiltrate the Boston-based DraftKings organization. And by "infiltrate," I mean "give them $100 so that I can be outsmarted by someone who goes by the screen name GoatsNHoes."

If you're not familiar with fantasy football... good for you. You're probably a well-adjusted person with an active social life and a healthy body mass index. But the idea is that you pick a roster of football players and their collective performance that week determines the success of your team. Most fantasy leagues are composed of friends who select teams during the preseason and keep them till December. DraftKings and its main rival, FanDuel, have a slightly different premise: You pick a new team every week. And there's money on the line.

I know, I know—that sounds like gambling. But it's not. You see, gambling is when you bet money to wager on some future outcome, whereas fantasy football is where you invest money to profit from some future outcome. It's just like the stock market, and nobody's ever compared the stock market to legalized gambling. Some guy at the roulette wheel putting $100 on red: That's gambling. You putting $100 in your DraftKings account because you think Julian Edelman's gonna have a huge game? That's just smart investing.

For my first game, I entered something called the NFL $75K Chop Block. It was a $50 buy-in and 1,577 players signed up to compete for $75,000 in prizes, which means DraftKings pocketed $3,850 for hosting a web page. I hope they throw some really debauched Wolf of Wall Street-style parties over there on Franklin Street.

I'll bet you're dying to know who I picked for my team and my rationalization for each choice, but listen: I don't know who's reading this, and there might be some people with heart conditions. I don't want to shock them with the sudden excitement they'd feel upon learning the details of my value-defense strategy. Suffice it to say you pick some good guys and some shaky guys and see how it turns out. From what I gather from the incessant TV ads, the process involves ignoring people at social functions while staring at your phone and occasionally screaming.

I also tried to put my other $50 into a second contest, but it turns out that I misread the rules and only ended up spending $3—thus making me possibly the first guy in DraftKings history who's too dumb to lose money.

When Sunday rolls around, I normally have a pretty good idea of what's going on. With a regular fantasy team, you have the same players week to week, so you get to know them in a way that's probably unhealthy. I have friends I haven't spoken to in months, but I can tell you all about Tevin Coleman's rib, when he broke it and how he's trying to regain his starting spot given Devonta Freeman's inarguable success. On some level, I feel like Tevin Coleman is my friend. I'm pulling for him. Because he's on my team and Freeman belongs to a hated rival, the Lucky Pierres.

I have friends I haven't spoken to in months, but I can tell you all about Tevin Coleman's rib.

But with DraftKings, I have a hard time remembering which players I picked. It's a bunch of mercenaries. And not only that, I don't know the faces behind any of the other fantasy hopefuls who are trying to take me down. If I win money, that's great, but I won't really derive any satisfaction from trumping someone called littlebushonmyjonson.

(And by the way, all these anonymous screen names are cowardly. My screen name is my actual name, because I stand behind my choices. I only saw one other guy who used his real name, a fellow named Richard Head. Good for you, Richard!)

As the actual football games progress, I realize that even though I have money riding on the DraftKings contests, I don't care as much about those as I do about my regular league, where the only thing at stake is honor. I mean, the guys in that league are people I really care about, and fantasy football is a means for us to stay in touch and support one another. For instance, one of my buddies couldn't make it to our league draft because his hair-extension business was robbed and he had to stay at the store that night. When I heard about that scary incident, I did what any concerned friend would do: I Photoshopped an image of the McDonald's Hamburglar clutching wigs in his hands, named him the Hairburglar and made that my team logo.

As for DraftKings, I still have $47 to bet—uh, invest. See you next week, GoatsNHoes. ◆

FUNNY GIRL

THE UP-AND-COMING COMEDIAN RIFFS ON HER 'DO, HER PEZ COLLECTION AND CRACKING UP KATE HUDSON.

STAND-UP COMEDIAN CAMERON ESPOSITO, 34, WAS raised in Chicago and went to Boston College. She honed her comedy chops with Improv Boston and Improv Asylum and will return to Boston to perform at Brighton Music Hall on Nov. 19. She has appeared on late-night programs such as Chelsea Lately, Conan and The Late Late Show, and she will film her first hourlong stand-up special in Dccember. She is the host of the weekly podcast Put Your Hands Together and has branched out into acting, having recently completed work on three indie movies as well as the Garry Marshall-helmed Mother's Day opposite Kate Hudson, Jennifer Aniston and Julia Roberts. Esposito is currently developing a project with NBC Universal, and her first book will be published in 2016. She lives in LA with her fiancee, fellow comedian Rhea Butcher.

JONATHAN SOROFF: Funniest person you know?
CAMERON ESPOSITO: My girlfriend, Rhea Butcher, who will be appearing with me in Boston, so that's a great treat for you guys.

How does that work in a relationship? Well, at this point in my career, being so huge and such a household name and all, a lot of people would want to be with me for my tens and hundreds of dollars, but she actually likes me. Besides, I started doing comedy in college. She started a bit later. So now she's nippin' at my heels, and I can't let her catch me, so it spurs me on to be better.

Who's the comedian you'd never want to piss off? Have you met any comedians? You don't want to piss anybody off. This is a small universe. You don't shit where you joke.

Were you really a theology major in college, and if so, why? So first of all, I always wanted to be a priest, which I know is crazy, because that's not even a thing. But I was like, "I'll be the one. The pope will change the rules for me." But seriously, people's cardinal beliefs about what we are doing here is the most interesting thing in the world to me. And that's also what stand-up comedy is about. Even if you believe in nothing, if you're an atheist, it has such bearing on the way you live your daily life. It's like being inside the clock, seeing how the machine works. It's like figuring out why we're on this planet. Faith is the oldest and most primal way of dealing with that. Science came along much later.

How did you get to the point where you have a side mullet? It was a terrible accident. I was riding my bike, went through a window face first and tore off the whole left side of my hair. It's not funny. Stop laughing at that.

What's your best feature? My Star Wars Pez collection. I have the whole set. It's the only thing I moved to Los Angeles with. I got here with no furniture, nothing to sit on, and my Pez collection. I thought, "Perhaps this was miscalculated."

Anything you'd never joke about? Nothing. But the thing is that you have to have a reason to talk about it, and a thesis that makes sense, and the joke has to prove that thesis. So that's the problem with some comics. They don't really have a reason for talking about a taboo subject. They're just milking the shock value. That, in my mind, is useless garbage. But I do believe comedy is one of the best ways to talk about things that are difficult and painful. Nothing is offensive if the joke makes sense.

"Comedy is one of the best ways to talk about things that are difficult.... Nothing is offensive if the joke makes sense."

Is it more difficult being a female comic than a male comic? Well, my experience being a male comic is extremely limited, so I don't really know.

But are there things you think you've faced that a guy wouldn't have? Yes, we are 50 percent of the population, and we're treated like some sort of fringe group. We're still fighting to just be in other rooms in the house other than the kitchen, and that extends to every field.

Favorite Boston venue? I got my start at Improv Boston. I was hired there right after I graduated from college. Then about a year later, I got hired by Improv Asylum, and I worked there for a short time. There are a lot of comics who know how to write jokes but then have to learn how to take up space on a stage and interact with an audience, and doing improv taught me that. I started doing improv at BC. I was in My Mother's Fleabag, which is the longest-running college improv troupe in the country. Amy Poehler was in it 10 years before me. Boston is where I received all my training. LA is where I learned how to wear makeup on my face and look good on camera.

Does comedy come from an angry place? Is it a form of aggression? I think it can be. I think something clearly happened to everyone who does stand-up, at some point in their lives, where they felt unheard. So one way to deal with that is to talk into a microphone to groups of people for the rest of your life. I also think that comics are often introverts, and doing stand-up is sort of a way to have control over a social situation. And finally, yes, of course we're angry. Isn't that part of being alive?

Comedian you most like being compared to? Kumail Nanjiani. He has figured out how to translate his opinions and thoughts into the broader world. He's someone that I saw when I was starting out in Chicago. I watched how he came up, and it's really exciting to see someone figure out how to lay out their career in a way that's more than just stand-up. Stand-up is exhausting. I don't want to work every night for the rest of my life. Only sometimes.

Working with Julia Roberts, Jennifer Aniston and Kate Hudson—exhilarating or intimidating? Most of my scenes were with Kate, and there were a lot of other people on that film who have been doing this for decades. Garry Marshall was directing. And acting is very new for me, but I realized that it's all about responding to your partner, and I'm good at that because that's what stand-up and improv are. But thank God those people were all very kind and patient while I was learning that. I got to make Kate Hudson laugh a lot, which was great. ◆

YOU'RE INVITED!

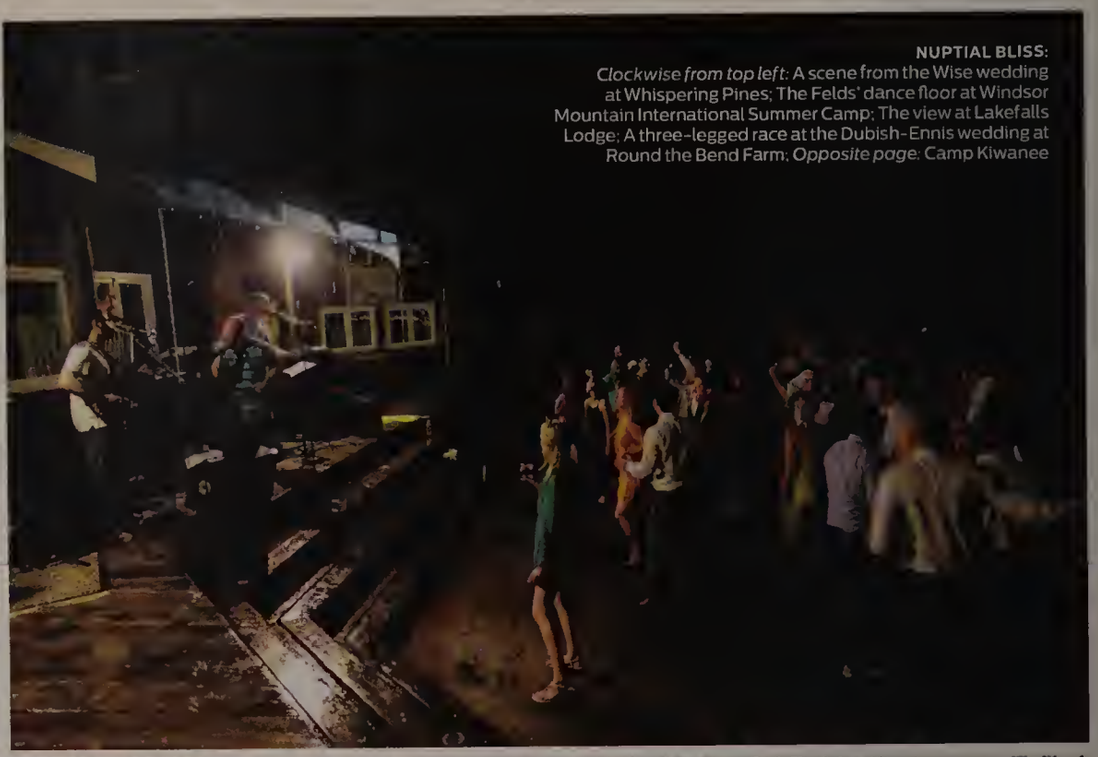
SLEEPING BAG: ROLLED. SWIMSUIT: PACKED. CORNHOLE: IN THE CAR. BUG SPRAY: APPLIED.

It may sound like the checklist for your annual camping trip—but it's increasingly what wedding guests are packing. From venues like kids' summer camps to remote cabins and working farms, brides are ditching heels for hiking boots and a whole weekend's worth of rustic festivities.



"We wanted something that would be really special and low-key that none of our friends had really done before. We looked at barns but ended up falling in love with a weekendlong thing," says Gillian Carter Feld, who married Jonah Feld at Windsor Mountain International Summer Camp last year. "Jonah really didn't want a wedding that was dance floor-focused." Instead, their guests spent a weekend in the woods of New Hampshire, plunging into the lake, kayaking and playing tetherball.

Beyond the fun factor, couples say having a lot of out-of-town guests in a single location can be less complicated than organizing hotel room blocks and activities in the city. Dylan and Keri Wise of Arlington were instantly enamored by the outdoor ceremony space and lakeside deck at Whispering Pines in West Greenwich, Rhode Island. Dylan says the charming cabins were just the accommodations they were looking for to host family making the trek from Ohio. "It would be such a bummer for them to drive out to Rhode Island and stay at a Holiday Inn."

What did their nearest and dearest think of roughing it? Although initial reactions were mixed (Keri's aunt asked if she "should wear a mosquito net"), by the end of the weekend most of the traditional folks had been won over. "It's difficult for some people to comprehend [the concept] at first," Dylan says. "In Ohio, weddings take place in churches and receptions in church basements. But Grandma was cool with it!" At Windsor, some of Gillian's relatives got in the spirit and even moved from their cabin into a tent.

Stephanie Yoder of Melrose, who was a bridesmaid in September at Camp Mataponi on Maine's Sebago Lake, said the only drawback was not being able to experience all of the activities as a guest. "It was my best friend's wedding, so of course I wanted to be in it," she says. "But my parents [who attended] got to go in a canoe on Saturday and got lobster rolls, whereas I was doing hair and makeup!" Yoder had initial concerns about what to pack for her parents, who flew in and couldn't bring much baggage, so she brought extra layers in case of chilly weather, along with sheets for the amusingly short bunk beds, sized for tween campers.

Accommodations for those getting wed in the woods can range from spartan setups with shared bathhouses to cozier quarters with linens, heat and private showers. So guests should definitely be advised via a detailed invitation and wedding website about what to expect, says local lawyer turned event planner Jennifer Cox of Esq. Events.

"Letting the guests know what they're getting into is really important, especially if they're getting on a boat and coming onto an island. You can't just run into CVS in the middle of nowhere," Cox says, reflecting on fetes she's organized at Sandy Island Family Camp on Lake Winnipesaukee in New Hampshire. Couples there have exclusive use of the island for a weekend, but have to barge in everything from cakes to makeup artists—and of course the guests themselves.

A thoughtful welcome bag can make all of the difference, Carter Feld adds.

Despite the expense of extra supplies, camp weddings can be more cost-effective than paying a cost per head at a traditional venue, since fees usually include housing and food, and alcohol can often be brought in wholesale. "You're creating a whole wedding weekend without paying to create individual events, and you really have that communal feel of sharing traditions with friends and new family," says Cox, who notes that such weekends are especially inclusive for children, since many camps' primary function is to keep little ones entertained.

Many of the couples Cox has worked with have fond memories of camping as kids and are excited about marking the milestone in a location with personal significance. That was certainly the case for Mathew and Bethany Hall of Whitman—the bride jokes that securing Camp Kiwanee in Hanson is part of what led Mathew to actually put a ring on it. "I think he finally got his act together 80 percent because he was ready to marry and 20 percent because he wanted to make sure we had Kiwanee locked down!"

For East Boston newlyweds Stella Dubish and Bryan Ennis, a true camp-out wedding with tents pitched at Round the Bend Farm represented a return to their roots, since the South Dartmouth spot was where they had their third date. The goal? "To be as little like a wedding as possible,"

"YOU'RE CREATING A WHOLE WEDDING WEEKEND WITHOUT PAYING TO CREATE INDIVIDUAL EVENTS, AND YOU REALLY HAVE THAT COMMUNAL FEEL OF SHARING TRADITIONS WITH FRIENDS AND NEW FAMILY."

Dubish says. She also eschewed the bridal shower—quite literally—since there weren't bathing facilities at their remote location. What that did mean, though, were fewer restrictions on partying late into the night with a bonfire, s'mores, sparklers and a singing competition. Although only 25 of the 160 guests chose to truly "rough it" (the others headed back to hotels), those who did enjoyed one of Dubish's favorite wedding memories. "We loved waking up in our tent to the sound of every single creature on the farm shouting out in joy at sunrise," she recalls. "Every bug, bird, chicken and sheep was just belting it out... it gave us a feeling of intense joy and celebration at living in this beautiful world." ◆

Sugar Rush

Run for your life at a Halloween 5K.

IF YOU THINK THE scariest thing about Halloween is the extra pounds from noshing on all that candy, take heart. Rugged Races has you covered with its inaugural Boston Common Costume Dash, a Halloween-themed 5K that invites revelers to suit up in costumes and work off those mini Snickers on a festive race through downtown Boston. Of course, you'll probably make up for the calories with beer at the Harpoon-sponsored after-parties at Beantown Pub, the Pour House, the Rattlesnake and Barracuda Tavern, but hey, 'tis the season. Come dressed to impress — and don't forget your sneakers — when the race kicks off bright and early in Copley Square on Oct. 31. — Alexandra Cavallo

The Boston Common Costume Dash 5K starts at 9 am on Oct. 31 in Copley Square Boston. $50. costumedash.com

GENDER BENDER

Boys will be girls in SpeakEasy Stage Company's Casa Valentina. Written by Harvey Fierstein (Kinky Boots) and inspired by true events, the 1962-set play centers on a group of straight male friends who spend their weekends vacationing at a Catskills resort—as women. Away from the constraints of a conservative society, the men are free to let their hair down, but they're faced with a crisis when forced to decide whether to reveal their secret identities to a public they fear will reject their "deviant" lifestyle. A hit on Broadway when it debuted last year, Casa Valentina continues its New England premiere run through Nov. 28 at the BCA's Calderwood Pavilion. / Alexandra Cavallo

MISS UNDERSTOOD For many great musicians, the highs of success are accompanied by personal lows. See: Amy, Whitney and, in pre-paparazzi days, Nina Simone. The singer, pianist and civil rights activist is the subject of director Liz Garbus' documentary What Happened, Miss Simone?, which draws on archival footage and interviews with friends and family to spotlight the singular talent whose work spanned jazz, blues, folk, R&B and beyond but saw her star dim in the early '70s as she struggled with an abusive husband and bipolar disorder. The film premiered this summer on Netflix, but you can catch the iconic artist on the big screen when Miss Simone plays on Nov. 5 at UMass Boston, where Garbus will be on hand for a Q&A. / Carly Olson

99 Homes ★★★1/2 You know there's something wrong when a real estate broker packs a gun. But then, Ramin Bahrani's sixth feature is set in 2010, not long after the housing market implosion of 2008, when brokers like Rick Carver (Michael Shannon) preyed on the helpless, such as Dennis Nash (Andrew Garfield), an honest construction worker in Florida who's unable to save his family home from sudden foreclosure. Out of work and luck, Dennis swallows his pride to try to get himself, his mother (Laura Dern) and his son (Noah Lomax) out of the motel where they and dozens of others in their situation have been forced to live. Making a Mephistophelean bargain, Dennis begins working for Rick, the man who kicked him out of his house. "Don't get emotional about real estate," the shark tells his protege, as Dennis all too quickly begins his transformation from prey to predator, and his slide into moral decay. To Rick, wealth equals self-respect, but Dennis is about to lose his, and the results are reminiscent of 2003's Crimson Gold, Jafar Panahi's humanist masterpiece about a good person driven to do bad things. You can see the pain in Garfield's performance, but it's Shannon who steals the film just as easily as Rick seizes homes. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Black Mass ★★ If there's one thing journeyman director Scott Cooper (Crazy Heart) gets right in this adaptation of former Boston Globe reporters Dick Lehr and Gerard O'Neill's nonfiction best-seller, it's the puggish, lived-in faces of his supporting cast—like the murderous members of James "Whitey" Bulger's notorious Winter Hill Gang, Rory Cochrane's Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and Jesse Plemons' Kevin Weeks. Alas, Mark Mallouk and Jez Butterworth's screenplay uses their first-person confessions as a framing device, only to drop it just as nonchalantly as Cooper drops Catherine Greig—Sienna Miller was filmed playing Whitey's girlfriend, but she's nowhere onscreen, one of many reasons the movie fails to find the man behind the mobster. Or rather, the man behind the makeup: As Bulger, Johnny Depp never cracks that devilish Whitey smile, probably because he's buried his matinee-idol looks under an immobile mound of prosthetics. And ice-blue contacts make him look more dead than alive—which also describes the film as a whole. It could have been a potent exploration of brotherhood, both literal and figurative (with Benedict Cumberbatch as Billy Bulger and Joel Edgerton as Whitey's townie FBI protector, John Connolly). Instead, Black Mass becomes a movie focused on bullet points rather than hits, chronological reporting lacking any depth or authorial control. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Bridge of Spies ★★★ A handsome dramatization of real events that took place during the late '50s and early '60s, Steven Spielberg's latest finds him returning to the talents of one of his (and America's) favorite leading men, Tom Hanks. For their fourth collaboration, Hanks slips comfortably back into Jimmy Stewart's old shoes as modern cinema's everyman. He's Cold War hero James B. Donovan, who's tapped as the defense attorney for accused spy Rudolf Ivanovich Abel (Mark Rylance), a British-born Soviet arrested in Brooklyn during the film's masterful, wordless prologue. "Everyone will hate me," says Donovan, who realizes what will happen to his reputation when he defends one of the most hated men in the country, "but at least I'll lose." Much of the understated humor—from the snappy patter to the enjoyably eccentric characters Donovan encounters once he's recruited by the CIA to arrange a spy exchange that drives the second half—comes from a script credited to the Coen brothers and Matt Charman. Still, it's Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy that shows through. It may be set during the height of the Cold War, but the movie's subtext is progressively modern; freedom isn't truly free if you value national security and state secrets over our Constitution. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Crimson Peak ★★1/2 "Ghosts are real," aspiring author Edith Cushing (Alice in Wonderland's Mia Wasikowska) says at the outset of director and co-writer Guillermo del Toro's latest, which he terms a "gothic romance." Well, he's certainly got the gothic part down, with production design that pulls you into the odd goings-on in Allerdale Hall, a decrepit old manse in the English countryside that's slowly sinking into the blood-red clay below and inhabited by strange siblings Thomas and Lucille Sharpe, played by Tom Hiddleston and Jessica Chastain (terrific, both). Alas, the romance is rather tepid, and if you're expecting a ghost story—and who wouldn't be after the 10-year-old Edith (Sofia Wells) is visited by the rotting specter of her dead mother in the prologue, which is set around a century ago—you may be disappointed, as del Toro lets his true intentions be known when the film jumps ahead 14 years. Meeting with a publisher, Edith pitches her short fiction: "It's not a ghost story...it's a story with a ghost in it, but the ghost is a metaphor for the past." That about sums up the film. But, oh, that production design! (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Grandma ★★★1/2 Unseen in a lead film role since Big Business in 1988, Lily Tomlin's enjoying one hell of a year. First, there was her hit Netflix series, Grace and Frankie. Now, the 76-year-old actress and comedian stars in this modest and unexpectedly emotional little gem as Elle, a poet who hasn't published in decades. Elle currently has about $40 to her name, so what's she to do when her granddaughter Sage (Julia Garner) shows up unannounced needing $630 before sundown? Why, set off on an 8-hour journey in her antique Dodge Royal as the two drop in on Cam (Nat Wolff), Sage's deadbeat boyfriend and part of the reason for her troubles. They also visit a couple of Elle's old friends (played by Orange Is the New Black's Laverne Cox and the late Elizabeth Peña), but it's the encounters with two of Elle's exes that gives the movie much of its heft. Sam Elliott is devastating as Karl, the man she wronged decades before, while Judy Greer—playing Olivia, the younger woman Elle's recently broken up with—is finally given a role to shine in after playing the token mom in three of this summer's blockbusters. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The Intern ★★★1/2 If there's something to be gleaned from movies like The Martian and this wonderful new comedy from writer/director Nancy Meyers (Something's Gotta Give), it's that films don't need villains to remain interesting. And the characters within don't need to struggle to be better people when they're pretty damn great to begin with. I'm not sure why many people don't seem to like Anne Hathaway, but as Jules Ostin, the successful, overwhelmed owner of an online fashion site, she's as good as ever. The real surprise here is Robert De Niro, who's been phoning it in for at least 15 years now. As Ben Whittaker, a 70-year-old widower who's become restless in retirement, he anchors the film with a subtle performance, and it's terrific to see him actually acting again. When Ben sees an ad looking for a "senior intern," the career company man jumps at the opportunity to join Jules' operation. The 30-something CEO doesn't want anything to do with this nattily dressed geezer at first, but he gradually, organically becomes a friend and confidante. Sure, there are brief misunderstandings between the two, but that's it for conflict. What remains is the radical idea of spending time with good people. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Martian ★★★★ Raise your hand if you've heard this one before: Matt Damon plays an astronaut who's stranded alone on an inhospitable planet, and he's willing to do just about anything to get back home to Earth. OK, put your hand down, because The Martian isn't Interstellar. It's better. In Ridley Scott's realistically science-minded triumph, the charming actor plays Mark Watney, who's abandoned and left for dead during a mission on Mars. A splendid adaptation of Andy Weir's speculative-fiction novel, this 3-D marvel focuses on Mark's efforts to stay alive. It will take four years for a rescue mission to reach him, and even with rationing, his food supply will only last a year. "Luckily, I'm a botanist," Mark says during one of his many video log entries, a device that allows the innately likable Damon to address the audience directly through much of the film; we believe in Mark as he concludes, "I'm gonna have to science the shit out of this." Does he ever. But rather than play things for suspense, as Alfonso Cuarón did in 2013's Gravity, the 77-year-old Scott presents his picture as a paean to the enduring spirit of man's ingenuity against overwhelming odds. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Sicario ★★★ French-Canadian director Denis Villeneuve is making quite the career out of creating a sense of creeping dread. Prisoners, his bleak revenge drama from 2013, didn't quite work, but there was an intensity to the performances that was matched by the work of cinematographer Roger Deakins and composer Jóhann Jóhannsson. Both rejoin Villeneuve on his latest movie, a moderately more successful vigilante film that hides the dark heart of a thriller. Set at the lawless border that separates the U.S. from Mexico, this picture won't do much to sway Donald Trump's mind about the "rapists." Then again, the shadowy people working for unidentified U.S. agencies in this bleak look at the War on Drugs won't give you much faith in our own motivations or moral high ground, a lesson that's learned the hard way by idealistic federal agent Kate Macer (Emily Blunt), who's recruited by flip-flop-wearing Matt Graver (Josh Brolin), a government task force official who tells her to observe as they "shake the trees and create chaos." Watching from the shadows is Benicio Del Toro's Alejandro, a consultant with a murky past and a personal agenda. Be prepared to take a shower when it's over. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Coolidge Corner, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Steve Jobs ★★★1/2 Screenwriter Aaron Sorkin loosely adapts Walter Isaacson's biography Steve Jobs into what's essentially a three-act play—a very cinematic one, captured on film (16mm and 35mm) and digital by Danny Boyle, Oscar-winning director of Slumdog Millionaire. Each format records the backstage moments before a product launch—the Macintosh in 1984, the NeXT Computer in 1988 and the iMac in 1998. Sorkin being Sorkin, he takes many dramatic liberties, crafting a tale populated by the ghosts of product launches past, present and future, represented by programmers Steve "Woz" Wozniak (Seth Rogen) and Andy Hertzfeld (Michael Stuhlbarg), former Apple CEO John Sculley (Jeff Daniels, a veteran of Sorkin's Newsroom) and Jobs' oft-rejected daughter Lisa (Makenzie Moss, Ripley Sobo and Perla Haney-Jardine). Nevertheless, the movie's fanciful fiction distills a real truth about who Jobs was. A lot of that credit also goes to Michael Fassbender; the actor may not physically resemble Jobs, but he embodies the man's vision. "I play the orchestra," Jobs says, describing what he does to Joanna Hoffman (Kate Winslet), his long-suffering "work wife." Ultimately, he's less of a husband than a father, the main role with which Sorkin defincs him. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

VICTORIA ★★★1/2 You might not notice it right off, given the naturalism of the performances, but director Sebastian Schipper's gripping film can be added to the list of movies shot in a single take—Mike Figgis' Timccode and Aleksandr Sokurov's Russian Ark being two other rare examples—and Victoria is significantly longer than those, which ran barely more than 90 minutes. Sure, last year's Best Picture winner, Alejandro González Iñárritu's Birdman, ran nearly two hours, but its multiple long takes were only edited together to appear as one continuous shot, making the film feel like a gimmick, its four Oscars be damned. So why does Schipper's 2-hour-and-18-minute picturc not feel like a stunt? Well, it might be because you'll marvel at how he was able to successfully manage the scope of his tale. Whereas the other films are sct in mostly one confined and controllable location, Schipper moves from a subterranean club to the streets and rooftops of Berlin, into cafes, and then to places wholly unexpected, as a rather average young romance between Victoria (Laia Costa) and Sonne (Frederick Lau) blossoms into an unbearably tense thriller when the Madrid-born title beauty's German vacation takes a turn into life-or-death territory. (At Kendall Square.)

THE WALK ★★1/2 Someone's bound to take the 20-minute vertiginous sequence at the center of this latest movie from director Robert Zemeckis (Forrcst Gump) and edit this titular walk into James Marsh's Oscar-winning 2008 documentary, Man on Wire. Both films focus on Philippe Petit, a Frenchman who, in 1974, dreamed of walking between the World Trade Center's twin towers on a high wire. Footage of this "artistic crime of the century" is all that's missing from Marsh's doc, which used still photos to illustrate the illegal feat. Zemeckis, who's frequently been better with technology than real people, beautifully recreates the tightrope routine in 3-D, using all of the CGI tools at his disposal. For instance, when Petit (played by Joseph Gordon-Levitt) takes a moment to lie back on the wire, a seagull flies into frame above him. It's a lovely image—and it's nearly ruined by the incessant chatter provided by Zemeckis and cowriter Christopher Browne's screenplay. Gordon-Levitt narrates most of the action in a Pepé Le Pew accent, which is matched by the unfortunately cartoonish-looking visual that bookends the film, as his Petit tells his tale from the Statue of Liberty's torch. Despite this, the movie stands as a stirring tribute to what we've lost. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

YOUNG BLOOD The Districts were playing sets at bars long before they could drink at them. The quartet started honing their blues-tinged rock, melding ragged guitars with smoky, lackadaisical vocals, as teens in basement sessions in their hometown of Lititz, Pennsylvania. But after one of their live sessions went viral, the high school pals graduated to bigger things, signing with Fat Possum Records (home to acts such as the Black Keys), releasing their second album, February's A Flourish and a Spoil, and appearing on the likes of Late Night with Seth Meyers. MUSEUMS & GALLERIES

Edited by Sarah Hagman

WRITE ON! The Harvard Graduate School of Education's new exhibit is one for the books. It features the work of Interview magazine founding photographer Michael Childers but forgoes his most frequently captured subjects, such as Hollywood greats like Clint Eastwood and performers from the Joffrey Ballet and Alvin Ailey Dance Company, instead zooming in on stars who usually let their writing speak for itself. Author, Author: A Photographic Retrospective of Authors, Playwrights, and Screenwriters turns the spotlight on portraits of wordsmiths like Ray Bradbury, Amy Tan, Gore Vidal and Tennessee Williams (pictured). Get a read on some literary giants at Harvard's Monroe C. Gutman Library Gallery, where Author, Author is on view from Oct. 29 through Nov. 20. / Sarah Hagman

I'LL TAKE SAT WORDS FOR 100, PLEASE, ALEX

The opera might not be over till the fat lady sings, but opera season doesn't begin until Boston Lyric Opera hosts its Opening Night Gala.

The black-tie evening began with an elegant dinner on the stage of the Wang Theatre, after which everyone crossed the street to see the company's superbly imaginative take on La Bohème at the Shubert Theatre. Then it was back to the Wang for Champagne, desserts, dancing and other bohemian behavior.

Prominent among the throng: the evening's honoree, Steve Akin, and his beautiful bride, Jane, equestrienne extraordinaire Diana Rockefeller, social arbiter Wendy Shattuck, opera buffs Sam Parkinson and Kurt Gress, the dashing Davin Wedel and David Paul, statuesque beauty Willa Bodman and her other half, Taylor, the hippie-chic Doris Yaffe, genius composer Tod Machover, new board chair Michael Puzo, and one woman who had yet to be served an entree at dinner and was asked by her hostess, "Are you neglected...or just vegetarian?"

However, the evening's funniest exchange came when one attendee started a sentence by saying, "Years ago, a friend of mine from Brooklyn married a woman from Michigan," at which point someone interrupted to say, "What?!? I thought there were miscegenation laws back then."

ARS LONGA, PARTY BREVIS

Whether you were in the market for a modern masterpiece or simply wanted to rub elbows with the in-crowd, the Park Plaza Castle was the place to be when the AIDS Action Committee hosted its biannual contemporary art auction on steroids, ARTcetera.

The turnout was stellar—not surprising given that the cochairs were party planner to the rich and famous Bryan Rafanelli and stunning blond supersocialite Alli Achtmeyer—and it included the likes of Venezuelan stunner Claudia Robaina and the ruggedly handsome Michael Winston, Miami-based artist Brian Burkhardt, media scion Pat Purcell Jr., incorrigible scamp Paul Karger, P-town museum head Chris McCarthy, the deCordova's John Ravenal, the always adorable Douglas Spencer and one person who vowed to stop bidding on things after his second cocktail, adding, "My in-laws' house is the graveyard for artwork we've bought while I was drunk."

The evening raised more than $700,000 for a cause that's vitally important, but lest it sound snooty, know that the following was overheard by the bar: "I was a tuna fisherman that summer when you were waitressing."

"My in-laws' house is the graveyard for artwork we've bought while I was drunk."

KNOW THYSELF

Riddle: When is a queen no longer a queen? Answer: When she's reigned over a magnificent kingdom for 33 years and steps down to let her hair down, which is what H.R.H. Princess Beatrix of the Netherlands did at the opening of the Museum of Fine Arts' exhibition Class Distinctions: Dutch Painting in the Age of Rembrandt and Vermeer.

The former monarch (from whom the ladies of Boston could learn a thing or 12) was perfectly charming, looked comme il faut and seemed to enjoy herself immensely while touring the exhibit, without much in the way of protocol and puffery.

That said, there was a dinner afterward in the Koch Gallery, and one benefactor said, "We all have to be seated before she enters the room," to which her husband replied, "With you here, that means we'll never get dinner." ◆

RAISE A GLASS!

THE BARTENDERS IN OUR FEATURE story shared more than Kold-Draft ice cubes during our photo shoot. (Thanks for bringing an igloo's worth, Daren.) As they shook up signature sips—cocktails that reveal something about their style or simply reflect what they're excited about right now—mutual admiration flowed through the studio along with the amari and aromatized wines. It was easy to see why: The dozen local drink slingers tapped by MC Slim JB represent a range of tastes and a mix of veterans and newer faces, but all are totally passionate about their craft.

Craft could be a keyword for this issue, one that extends to Renaissance man Nick Offerman, whose interview with Jonathan Soroff touches on both woodworking and acting (not to mention mustaches). He'll be plying both trades during his stay in town this season, which has him starring in the Huntington's world premiere stage adaptation of A Confederacy of Dunces and delivering a talk titled Sawdust and Mirth at the CraftBoston Holiday expo. Turns out the talented actor, carpenter, writer and comedian can also make a mean Old Fashioned, as we discovered at our cover shoot. And there's lots more boozy fun in this issue: I investigate some alcohol-infused arias being featured in a most unusual opera program, Alayna Eberhart tasks a top sommelier with decoding scents inspired by sake and moonshine, and Meghan Kavanaugh gets some pro tips from a cocktail caterer. Cheers.

Go ahead and order another round, Boston—the craft cocktail concierge service isn't going anywhere. (Except, perhaps, to your next party.) Trailblazer Booze Époque is going strong in its fourth year, and seasoned bar pros and Bogie's Place alums Domingo-Martin Barreres and Kevin Mabry are readying for a spring roll-out of their Barmobile, housed in a revamped 1953 Flxible bus. And just last month, Texas transplant Crystal Mills celebrated the official launch of WanderLush, the mobile bartending biz that allows the longtime cocktail enthusiast to bring handcrafted sips into your living room or office. "I've always been that cocktail girl with my family," she explains. "I've been required to bring the sangrias to Thanksgiving and mix up drinks for barbecues."

Now Mills aims to make other people's special occasions a little more so by using freshly squeezed juices, homemade syrups and flavored local bitters in her bespoke concoctions. "After every event I've ever done, every client has said, 'This was so worth it. This was the extra little detail for my event that people are still talking about,' " she says. But as for what Mills reaches for after a long day, she laughs: "Is it very wrong of me to say all I want is a beer?" / Meghan Kavanaugh

Mills' Tips for Home Tippling

Make batch cocktails: "It's a huge pressure release off the host when they're [not] one second pulling a turkey out of the oven and then trying to also simultaneously mix drinks."

Play with ice: "[For whiskey drinks], you can get these large sphere ice cube molds. ... You can also mix things into your ice. For one of my drinks, I actually put succulents in an ice cube."

Get in the spirit: "Gin is kind of a go-to. ... Right now, I'm actually obsessed with [Everett-based] Short Path."

THROWBACK ALERT

That's the cost of the Harvest Wallbanger at Harvest, which is wisely celebrating its 40th birthday with a cocktail instead of cake. The Harvard Square restaurant is serving its take on a Harvey Wallbanger—made with vodka, orange juice, seasonal fruit and a house vanilla-and-herb simple syrup—at that nice 1970s price throughout the month of November.

LET'S BE FRANC

Cabernet franc is a sleeper grape, relatively unknown but often far more charming in the glass than its superstar offspring, the brash, bold cabernet sauvignon. Even when young, cabernet franc is fragrant, tart and soft in tannins, but it delivers quite a flavor punch, suggestive of red fruits, herbs and subtle spices. The grape thrives in moderately cool climates and is incredibly versatile with food. The following three examples are delicious. / Sandy Block

CHÂTEAU DU COUDRAY MONTPENSIER LE GRAND BOUQUETEAU, CHINON, 2014

This Loire Valley winner is a startling purple hue. Supple and juicy it's full of bright rich cherry and raspberry fruit, with undertones of spices, smoke, black olive and licorice. It's an artisan wine, made from low-yield hand-picked grapevines. Most cabernet francs leave the palate craving savory dishes, and this pick is no different. It's terrific with grilled herb-rubbed chicken.

$14 Flower Food Wine Co Newton

DOMAINE DE LA NOBLAIE LES CHIENS-CHIENS, CHINON, 2012

Another Chinon pick, this wine has a distinctive meat-like aroma, with ripe berry, tobacco, violet and dried green herb accents. It's an earthy cabernet franc with concentrated, juicy fruit and intense acids. Luscious and savory, its lingering umami flavor makes an ideal accompaniment to vegetarian dishes, such as grilled eggplant or anything dressed with a salty, savory tapenade.

$19 Cities Wine & Spirits Woburn

RAVINES CABERNET FRANC, FINGER LAKES, 2013

Tipsy Tunes

You'd be surprised how often alcohol plays a supporting role in opera plots. Hence Brindisi! Italian and French Drinking Songs, a Dec. 4 happening in the MFA's Remix series that will have Boston Lyric Opera singers performing booze-infused arias in the European galleries, followed by drinks, discussion and a singalong. We tapped BLO director of artist operations Nicholas Russell for a taste of three featured tunes. / Jacqueline Houton

THE SONG: "Libiamo" from Verdi's La Traviata
THE SCENE: "Alfredo, who is passionately in love with the courtesan Violetta, is a guest at her decadent party. Encouraged by his friend to show off his voice, Alfredo begins this toast and is joined by Violetta and the rest of the party guests, singing, 'Let's drink from joyful cups!'"
THE SIP: "Alfredo loves a nice Italian red wine, perfect for toasting to love."

THE SONG: "Musetta's Waltz" from Puccini's La Bohème
THE SCENE: "Musetta, a beautiful young singer, arrives at the Cafe Momus on the arm of a rich older man. Spotting her old flame, Marcello, across the room, she sings this flirtatious and risque song to delight the crowd and make her ex wild with jealousy and desire."
THE SIP: "Musetta's drink of choice is Champagne—bubbly, light and, naturellement, so French!"

THE SONG: "The Tipsy Aria" from Offenbach's Lo Périchole
THE SCENE: "Two poor street singers, Périchole and Piquillo, are in love but cannot afford a marriage license. When a nobleman makes Périchole an offer she cannot refuse, she drinks her sorrows away."
THE SIP: "Périchole is a character who loves a sweet drink and perhaps indulges too much, too fast—lemon drops for all!"

ON THE WEB *Boston Lyric Opera isn't the only one combining sounds and sights in a museum setting. PATRICK LEE SAYS THERE WAS NEVER A pro-Cambridge tilt when the Grafton Group opened its first restaurant, Grafton Street, nearly 20 years ago. But it took a long time to open a restaurant in a Boston zip code.

"I think once we opened Park [in 2012], that's when we realized our next restaurant likely would be in Boston," Lee says. "So when we started looking again, we focused a bit on Boston."

The spot Lee found for State Street Provisions is along the Greenway on Long Wharf, where the short-lived City Landing and Sel de la Terre once resided. Slated to open in late November, the restaurant sports a contemporary rustic style with hardwood floors and dark banquettes. The dining room provides a view of the Greenway, while the lounge area's focal point is the massive bar. That's where Kyle Powell will head up a beverage program featuring classic cocktails as well as a hot grog that will change each week. On tap will be the usual selection of local craft beers as well as two white wines, two red wines and an amaro to help lure other restaurant workers.

"We like the idea that it's for the industry crowd," Lee says. "We're going to be serving food later into the night, and it'll be really quality products, so they won't see a drop off in quality."

The kitchen is helmed by Tom Borgia, who was previously at the Grafton Group's Russell House Tavern. The menu will share many of the same characteristics as that restaurant's unfussy offerings, with a raw bar, fresh pasta and sausage of the day, pizzas, sandwiches and seasonal small plates. Lee expects the engine of the restaurant to be the pantry, an exposed portion of the kitchen that will turn out fresh-baked breads, cheese, charcuterie, terrines, preserves and pickled fare to be displayed on a Carrara marble counter.

"It's the heart of the restaurant," Lee says. "It's going to have an energy all its own. It's a part of the restaurant that connects the kitchen to the bar."

Energy is what's needed in the 180-seat space, which will be hosting its third restaurant in three years. But Lee sees plenty of potential for attracting diners and making sure the spot buzzes like its four Cambridge siblings.

"The people who work around this area or in the same building, or who live at Harbor Towers or the North End—if we can capture them, then we think everything will sort of fall into place," Lee says. "It's an exciting area because the Greenway is really coming into its own. ... We feel like there really is a demand that we can tap into."

Good Eats: Going Green

Branch Line will become known for its rotisserie chicken and extraordinary beer program, but don't overlook the unassuming bar bite of salted avocado. The brand-new Watertown spot, a suburban extension of Garrett Harker's Eastern Standard, shows the creamy fruit serious respect: The perfect specimen is carefully sliced, dressed in vinaigrette that pops with sweet fresh marjoram and crisp pickled mustard seeds, and topped with strips of clean, salty-rich ricotta salata peeled from chef de cuisine Stephen Oxaal's batch. You'll be scraping up every last bit. / Elizabeth Bomze

SOUL FOODIE

Andrew Zimmern knows plenty about food, but he also knows about hunger. Before getting sober 24 years ago, the Bizarre Foods host spent a year on the streets. "I took meals many times, in places that offered a helping hand and a hot plate of food," Zimmern says. That's why he serves on the advisory board for local food rescue Lovin' Spoonfuls, which will present him with the Thomas M. Menino Award for Leadership at its fifth annual Ultimate Tailgate Party. We talked taste with Zimmern before the Tailgate hits Cruiseport Boston on Nov. 22. / Alexandra Cavallo

YOU'VE ACCRUED MANY AWARDS. HOW DOES THIS ONE MEASURE UP? This award is super special to me because it throws a little bit of light on a part of my life. .. Plus, to do it in a city like Boston—I lived there for a year and a half in 1980 and had my first real job cooking for money there. I made seven bucks an hour working at the Harvard Book Store Cafe.

I'M SURE THE CULINARY LANDSCAPE HAS CHANGED A LOT. Oh my gosh. When I was working here, it was over 30 years ago—35 years ago! I'm getting old. It was a different place in time. My big sadness is that Gordon Hamersley's place closed. Hamersley's Bistro used to be a place I went every single time I was in Boston, wonderfully anonymously. His cassoulet, in the wintertime, was one of the great dishes in the city; that I'll miss very much

SO WHAT'S THE MOST BIZARRE FOOD YOU'VE EATEN? The palolo that I ate in the Samoa episode. It's a sea worm that rises up out of the coral beds a couple times a decade when atmospheric conditions are just right.

ONE FOOD EVERYONE SHOULD TRY? I think the world would radically change if we started eating more little fish with their heads on them. We end up eating all these luxury species of fish—salmon, cod, tuna, shrimp—almost to the point of extinction, in the wild sense. Not only do those tiny, oily fish with their heads on them taste best, it would do our planet the greatest good.

Don't expect to find bread and milk at Coolidge Corner's new Boston General Store. Instead, owner April Gabriel has stocked the spot with quality artisanal goods inspired by the childhood summers she spent in the Berkshires with her grandmother. Gabriel, a former architect, first established the business in 2013 as an e-commerce company operated out of her Southie apartment; then she started selling at SoWa and, last month, opened the brick-and-mortar shop, complete with resident dog Olive. While the products do include candles, stationery and hand-crafted bitters, most of the stock is built to last. Take cake pans with a lifetime warranty, enamel coffee pots, salvaged-wood serving boards and the same Ohio Stoneware mixing bowl set her grandmother used to own. "Now it's in my mom's kitchen, and then it's going to be in my kitchen, and hopefully my kids' after that," Gabriel says. FENWAY'S BIG SWING

Hurling returns—yes, returns!—to Fenway Park on Nov. 22 alongside an Irish Festival featuring the Dropkick Murphys. It's been more than 60 years since the last hurling match at Fenway, so here's a quick refresher on the sport. / Matt Martinelli

THE HISTORY: The first hurling match at Fenway Park was held in 1916, and the most recent one was a 1954 exhibition between Cork's All-Ireland team and the New England All-Stars.

ORIGINS: Hurling dates back thousands of years, but the sport's current rules were devised in 1884. It's primarily an Irish sport, though there are also teams in the U.S., Canada, Australia and elsewhere in Europe.

THE TEAMS: Dublin and Galway will take part in the Fenway match, which consists of four 12-minute quarters plus stoppage time.

PLAYERS TO WATCH: Mark Schutte, 23, is an up-and-coming forward for Dublin, and Galway captain David Collins, 31, is an All-Star.

THE EQUIPMENT: Traditionally made of ash, the stick is called a hurley, and it can strike or carry the ball, called a sliotar. The goal is about the same size as a soccer goal.

THE RULES: To gain possession, you can catch the sliotar in your hand or scoop it up with the hurley. Once you have the sliotar, you can take four steps with it in your hand but you must then carry it on the hurley. You strike the sliotar with your hand or hurley to advance it down the field or into the goal.

FORMAT: This is a Super 11 match, which means there are only 11 players on each side instead of the standard 15. In the modified format, there are no points for hurling the ball over the crossbar, players score by getting the sliotar into the net, earning 3 points for a shot taken within 20 yards and 5 points for a shot taken from farther away.

RIVALS AND REVIVALS

A LOCAL ARTIST REFLECTS ON REPAIRING A TROUBLED BROTHERHOOD IN A NEW MEMOIR.

We Were Brothers* by Barry Moser
Published by Algonquin Books, 192 pages, $22

HOW OFTEN SIBLINGS SEEM TO HAIL from separate planets, understanding their lives and values very differently. It's an irony sadly expressed in the "were" of the title of this memoir written and illustrated by Barry Moser, an art professor at Smith College, who grew up in the Jim Crow South alongside his older brother, Tommy, in a family where racism was rampant.

One mingy exception to the family's prejudice was their relationship with Verneta, their mother's childhood friend, who helped care for the boys. A heart-breaking anecdote recalls how a young Verneta pressed flour on her face, hoping to feign whiteness and visit a movie theater. Nothing had improved by the time the Moser boys were growing up. In one frightening moment, Ku Klux Klan members drive by, calling out, "N----! Don't you never fergit yore place." The terrified Verneta knocks on the Mosers' door; their mother comforts her, but their uncle Floyd doesn't even look up from canasta, contemptuously declaring that Verneta's brother "gets a mite uppity sometimes."

Barry comes to bristle at such prejudice, but Tommy absorbs it, viciously criticizing Barry for sitting with black passengers on a bus. Eventually, Barry leaves Chattanooga for a liberal life as an artist in the North; Tommy stays and becomes a banker, and the divide between them deepens. But after 40 years of near estrangement, they finally reconnect, mostly through letters. Each takes some responsibility for his past actions, even discovering surprising brotherly bonds. Moser's drawings throughout capture hidden tenderness, and his words tease out the pains and rewards of reconciliation.

FROM PAGE 109: I was a seventeen-year-old fascist, having been well indoctrinated and initiated by five years of other young dilettante fascists. I barked and hollered and screamed and prodded and poked and slapped my troops upside their heads just like I had been barked at and hollered at and poked and prodded and slapped upside my head when I was their age. ◆

If you're shy about handling a hawk, you can attend an intro session as an observer for $30.

The center's red barn and surrounding mountains make for excellent photography backdrops.

Harris's hawks are native to the Southwest, so extreme cold weather makes them unhappy. Take note when planning your visit.

FLIGHT OF FANCY: The Woodstock Inn's New England Falconry Center lets you handle a hawk

The Escape Artist / Andrew Rimas

HAWK THIS WAY

THE WOODSTOCK INN'S FALCONRY PROGRAM TAKES FLIGHT IN VERMONT

An adult male Harris's hawk has a length of about 20 inches, a wingspan of about three-and-a-half feet and a hokey sense of humor. That's why Rangle, one of the six hawks in residence at the Woodstock Inn's New England Falconry Center in Vermont, likes to hop off his perch and scuttle around the ground, pecking at slugs and tufts of grass. "Look at me," he seems to be saying. "I'm not an ancient symbol of warrior nobility, hallowed with millennia of reverence. I'm a kooky chicken!"

But then he goes and swoops from a treetop to your wrist at 40 miles per hour, landing in a splay of brilliant plumage, and you understand why Genghis Khan thought this made for a fashion-forward accessory. Hawks are one of nature's reminders that Homo sapiens is hopelessly outclassed, not only in speed and grace, but in cool.

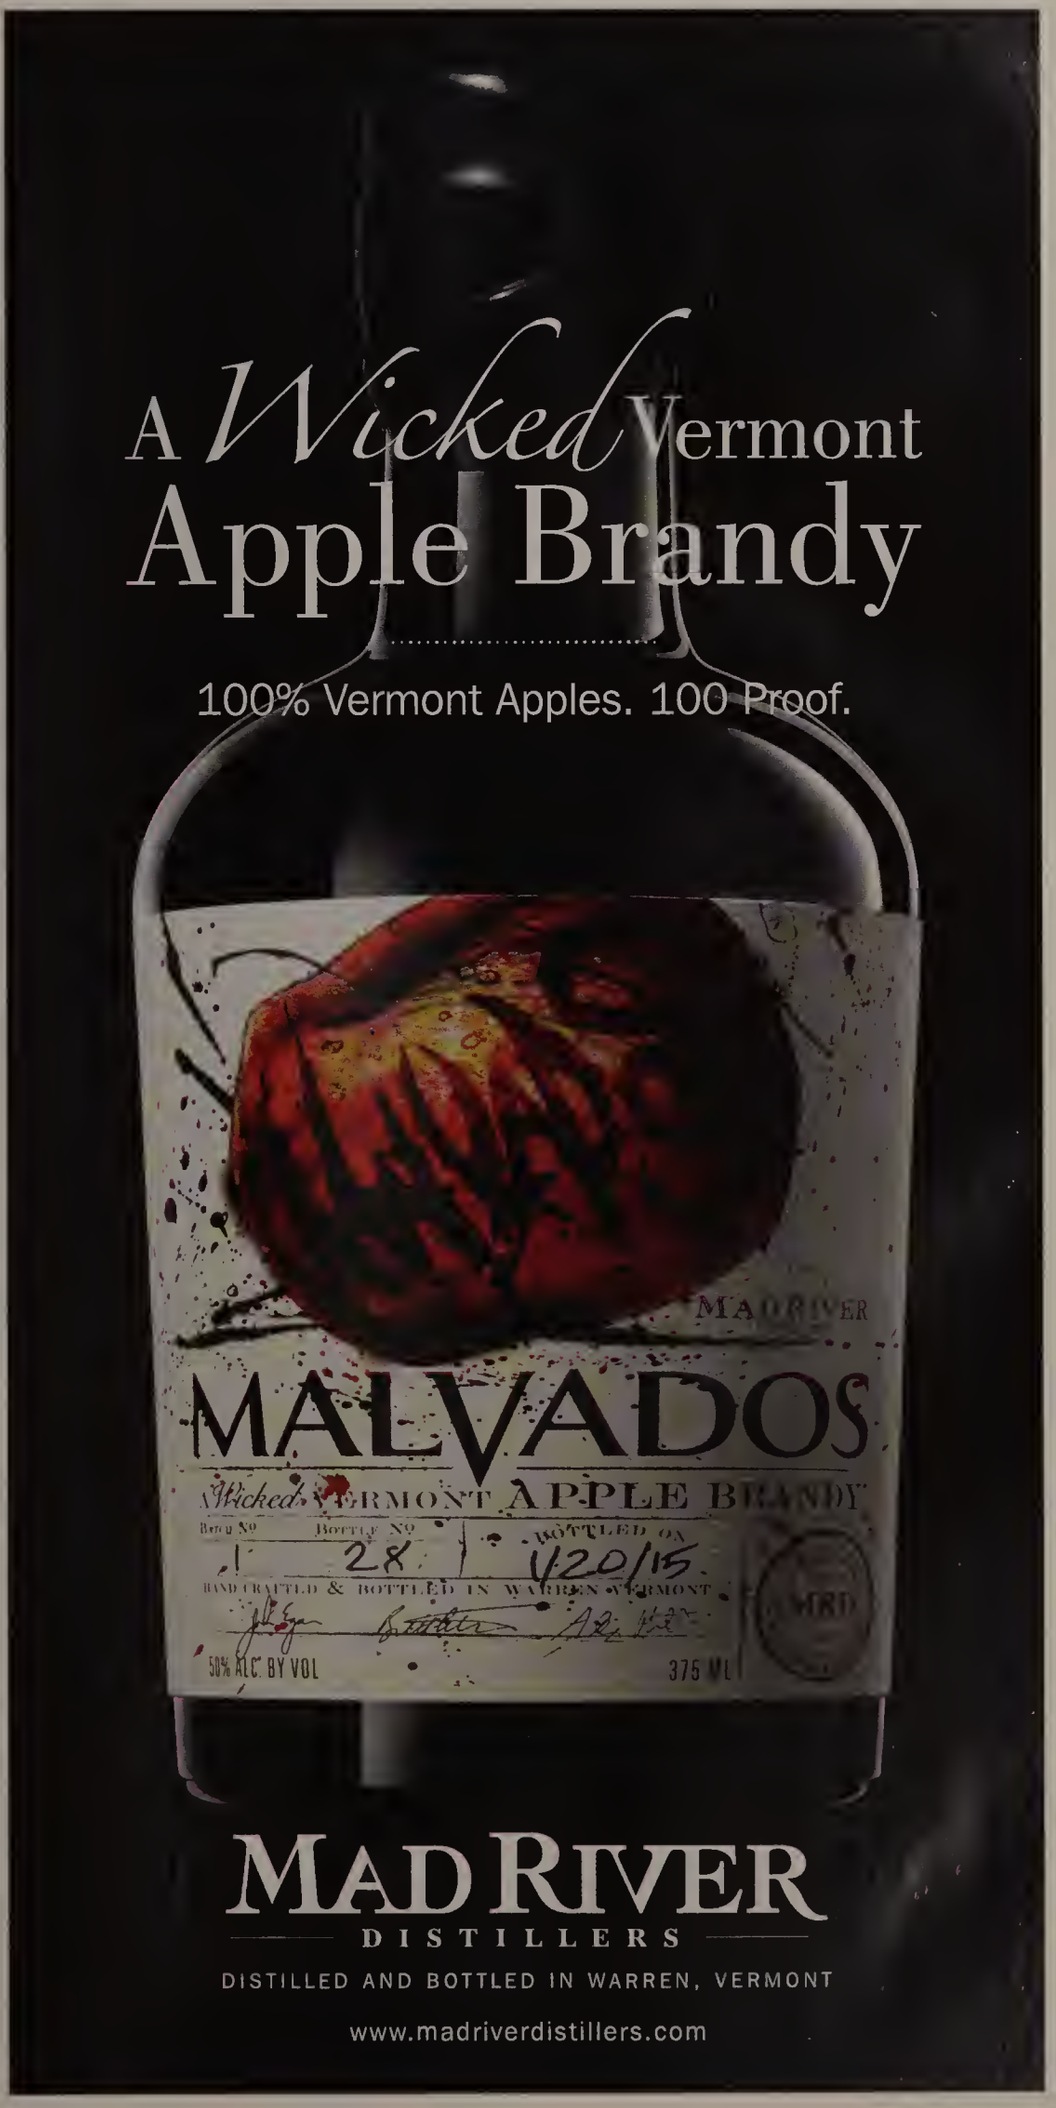
Rangle's chicken act, it turns out, isn't a behavior shared by every member of his species. Harris's hawks have distinct personalities—one of the many facts about raptors that you learn during a visit to New England Falconry. While the Woodstock Inn is famous throughout the Northeast as a destination for weddings, spa days and picturesque vacations, since the falconry center opened in July, it's now become popular as a destination to meet a Eurasian eagle owl.

Housed in a restored red barn on a hillside with a view of Mount Tom, the center offers 45-minute hands-on sessions ($95) with its birds, complete with loaner Hunter boots and Barbour jackets. First comes an introductory tour and presentation, in which you'll learn that Harris's hawks hunt in packs like wolves and can live to be about 35 years old in captivity. Then it's time to don a heavy leather glove and march up the mown hillside, hawk in tow. Jessica Snyder, one of the falconers, restrains Rangle from a premature launch by holding his "jesses," leather straps on his legs worn alongside little bells and a transmitter in case he tries to make a dash for freedom—an unlikely occurrence, since he was hatched in captivity and knows the hand that feeds him. In this case, yours.

The birds are trained to fly to any outstretched glove they see, knowing that they'll get a tidbit of raw beef, so visitors are encouraged to keep their arms lowered unless they want to catch a handful of raptor.

Which is really the point. Despite his wingspan, his knifing beak and talons built for vivisection, Rangle lands with all the weight of a butterfly. He makes barely a tap. Then, good-naturedly, he pokes and nibbles at the glove, clearly enjoying the contact. Holding a Harris's hawk at arm's length, you assess him like a museum piece: the filigree in his plumage, the ridge of his brow, the gun-barrel intensity of his stare. It's an experience that convinces you that dinosaurs most certainly wore feathers. Then he flings himself into the sky, and in an eye blink, he's a hundred feet away in the treetops.

The program is open to the general public, but any visit to Woodstock is incomplete without a stay at the inn. The spa demands at least an afternoon to experience its scented steam rooms, outdoor Jacuzzi and fireplace, and first-rate treatments (like the hot chocolate body wrap). Beware of the boutique. It's a study in how curatorial expertise—evidenced by Zents aromatherapy and charming mittens made from recycled sweaters—can entrap a wallet.



After falconry and massage, finish a perfect day with dinner at the resort's AAA Four Diamond restaurant, The Red Rooster. The elegant bar attracts a neighborhood clientele, and the cocktail program leans on local ingredients, as does the menu. Salads draw from the resort's organic garden, and the nearby farms boast an embarrassment of cheeses. Don't miss the three-beet appetizer with Cremont double cream cheese or the New England lamb chops with kale and pumpkin puree. Alternatively, pull up a cozy armchair in Richardson's Tavern for a bean cassoulet with pork belly and a beer from one of the outstanding nearby breweries, like the malty red Valor Ale by 14th Star Brewing Company. The downstairs game room is kitted out with free 1980s arcade machines, shuffleboard and vintage pinball, while a seat by the lobby's great fireplace is a snug place to nurse a nightcap.

The Woodstock Inn has always been a welcoming base for exploring the Green Mountains. With the addition of New England Falconry, it offers a heightened perspective on one of Vermont's iconic towns. ◆

HALL'S WAY

A SOLID, ECLECTIC MENU COMES WITH A SMALL SIDE OF WEIRDNESS.

WORDEN HALL
22 W. Broadway, Boston
(617-752-4206)
wordenhall.com

South Boston's swarms of lately arrived young-professional residents have given rise to a slew of restaurants like Lincoln Tavern, Loco Taqueria and Coppersmith that share common traits. They boast industrial good looks, punishing noise levels and food and drinks that are modernish without getting too fussy. The new Worden Hall, an easy rock toss from the MBTA's Broadway station, belongs squarely in this niche, with its handsome, cacophonous room of exposed brick, yellow-glowing chandelicrs, cozy leather banquettes and long penny-topped bar, buttressed by a versatile, eclectic menu and deep beverage program.

One inimediate standout is chef Tim McQuinn's rendition of Chicago-style deep-dish pies. Forget the horrible casual-dining chain Uno's; the original as done in Chicago is a treat. It's a steep-sided, dense, oily crust thickly filled with layers of ingredients, pan-cooked into a hefty pizza/casserole hybrid. Hush your East Coast thin-crust partisanship: Worden's version is canonical and truly fine, especially the soppressata and garlic sausage pie ($20) with broccoli rabe, a slightly sweet, chunky tomato sauce and three quality cheeses—mozzarella, provolone and the Parmesan-like Grana Padano. The simpler margherita ($20) with that same rustic tomato sauce, good mozzarella and whole leaves of fresh basil is another winner, though a bit wetter than optimum. I'll be back just for these.

There's also a riff on the similarly peculiar Chicago dog, originally a steamed frank on a poppy-seed bun topped with mustard, onions, garishly neon-green relish, a dill-pickle spear, tomatoes, tiny pickled chilies and celery salt. Here, the Kobe beef Chi Town dog ($7) is unequivocally bizarre: a messy pileup of napa slaw, fat pickled mustard seeds and a wide smear of Sriracha mustard. It's not bad, but alluding to the original is akin to adding tomatoes to New England clam chowder. You can do it; just call it something else, please.

A generous plate of crispy chicken wings ($13) is labeled "Carolina-style BBQ," presumably a nod to the vinegary/sweet glaze. But a Buffalo native must have wandered into the kitchen, topping the wings with chopped celery and blue cheese alongside a ranch dressing dip. It's weird but undeniably tasty. By contrast, grilled shrimp and green papaya salad ($14) reads like the classic Thai som tam, built on shredded (unripe, thus firm and savory) papaya, cucumbers, mango and some crunchy cashews, but the dressing lacks the essential chili heat and fish-sauce umami of the original, though the topper of plump grill-charred prawns is a saving grace.

Southie old-timers may roll their eyes at the use of "spuckies" (Italian-American subs) to describe Worden's assortment of sandwiches on Pullman or flatbreads. But the house-smoked pastrami ($15), which is fiercely imbued with more apple-wood smoke than any pastrami I've ever tasted, is still superb, layered with beer cheese, whole-grain mustard and pickles between Iggy's excellent dark rye. Red lentil and chickpea falafel ($13) is a spot-on take on the Levantine classic of crunchy legume fritters, pickled cucumbers, red onion and tahini in, for some reason, naan. A side of quality curly fries ($6) helps ease the misnomer cringes.

Meanwhile, smoked lamb ribs ($15) feature meaty, chewy specimens served with a good shepherd's salad and creamy tzatziki, a perfect evocation of traditional Greek flavors. McQuinn also shines when he shows off his French technique, as in Parisienne gnocchi ($11), attractively pan-browned, just-firm, not-too-heavy little dumplings with squash, mushrooms, roasted-garlic cream sauce and good pecorino, likewise in celery root and honeycrisp apple soup ($8), a velvety, savory/sweet puree with shaved cabbage, bits of crisp pork belly and a drizzle of sherry vinaigrette. Entrees show similar finesse, as in sweet, faintly seared scallops ($27) flanked by a lovely bulgur pilaf with roasted corn, and tenderloin-like roasted beef shoulder tender ($28) with horseradish crema, red-wine jus and crunchy rosti potatoes. The few modest desserts include an oatmeal-based autumn fruit crisp ($8) of apples, pears, currants and excellent Christina's cinnamon ice cream, hearty and comforting enough for two.

The big, bustling bar turns out creditable serious cocktails like the suddenly ubiquitous Last Word ($13) of gin, green Chartreuse, maraschino liqueur and lime juice. An impressive spirits selection, notably of whiskey, is another bonus, though menu prices would be helpful. The long, worthy beer list, with 40 taps and 60 bottles, suffers from confusing organization but covers enough ground, much of it local, to keep beer geeks coming back, from the acerbic cask-conditioned Ballast Point Grapefruit Sculpin IPA ($8) to a big bottle of St. Louis Gueuze ($14), a wild-fermented Belgian lambic with an of-the-moment sourness. The wine list has decent, mostly modestly priced breadth in both glasses and bottles. Service does a respectable job of helping diners navigate the all-over-the-map food and beverages, and should not be blamed for the long pauses between courses on some jam-packed evenings.

Ultimately, while an overeducated gourmand can throw shade at the menu's occasional malapropisms and odd-bedfellows concepts, Worden Hall still works beautifully overall for its New Old Southie neighborhood, mostly delivering well-executed, at times inspired food and drinks in a lively, convivial setting at fair prices. Tell your food-dork friends to stifle their snickering and just enjoy. ◆

Q: ARE THERE BENEFITS TO APPLYING TOPICAL VITAMIN C TO MY SKIN?

A: Advanced skin care products containing anti-oxidant vitamins C, E, CoQ10 and green tea, are definitely one of the best ways to protect your skin. These anti-oxidants help to neutralize free radicals that would otherwise break down your skin cells and cause free radical damage, which leads to wrinkles, sagging skin and discoloration.

However, in order to be effective, these products must have certain characteristics. They must be formulated to penetrate deeply into the skin, they must contain a high concentration and a high proportion of anti-oxidants, as well as being made from the highest quality of ingredients. If an anti-oxidant product meets these criteria, it should make a noticeable difference in the health and appearance of your skin.

The tricky part of selecting a product is that product labeling does not give you adequate information to know if the product meets all of the above criteria. Naturally, my favorite professional brand of skin care products is SkinHealth ™, for vibrant, healthy skin.

HOT OFF THE PRESS

TOM MCCARTHY SHINES A SPOTLIGHT ON TWO OF BOSTON'S BIGGEST INSTITUTIONS.

THERE ARE ONLY SO MANY TIMES THE mortgage can be refinanced on the Fourth Estate; it's no surprise that print journalism is dying in our increasingly digital world. This is a fact that an old newspaperman like myself laments every time I read (on the Internet) that another metropolitan paper will be printing its last. Now the rest of you can share in my misery, thanks to director and cowriter Tom McCarthy's taut, superb drama Spotlight, which illuminates the people who make this fading institution great.

In 2003, The Boston Globe's Spotlight Team—the oldest continuously operating newspaper investigative unit in the United States—won a Pulitzer Prize for Public Service for its "courageous, comprehensive coverage" of the Roman Catholic Church's sexual-abuse scandal. The painful scandal itself is all too familiar to Bostonians who followed the four-person unit's exhaustive yearlong reporting, but McCarthy and cowriter Josh Singer (The Fifth Estate) sensed that there was an equally compelling story behind the stories. And indeed, Spotlight, which focuses on the work done by The Globe's Walter "Robby" Robinson (Michael Keaton) and the rest of his team—Mike Rezendes (Mark Ruffalo), Sacha Pfeiffer (Rachel McAdams) and Matt Carroll (Brian d'Arcy James)—might just be the best film about investigative journalism since Alan J. Pakula's 1976 Oscar winner All the President's Men.

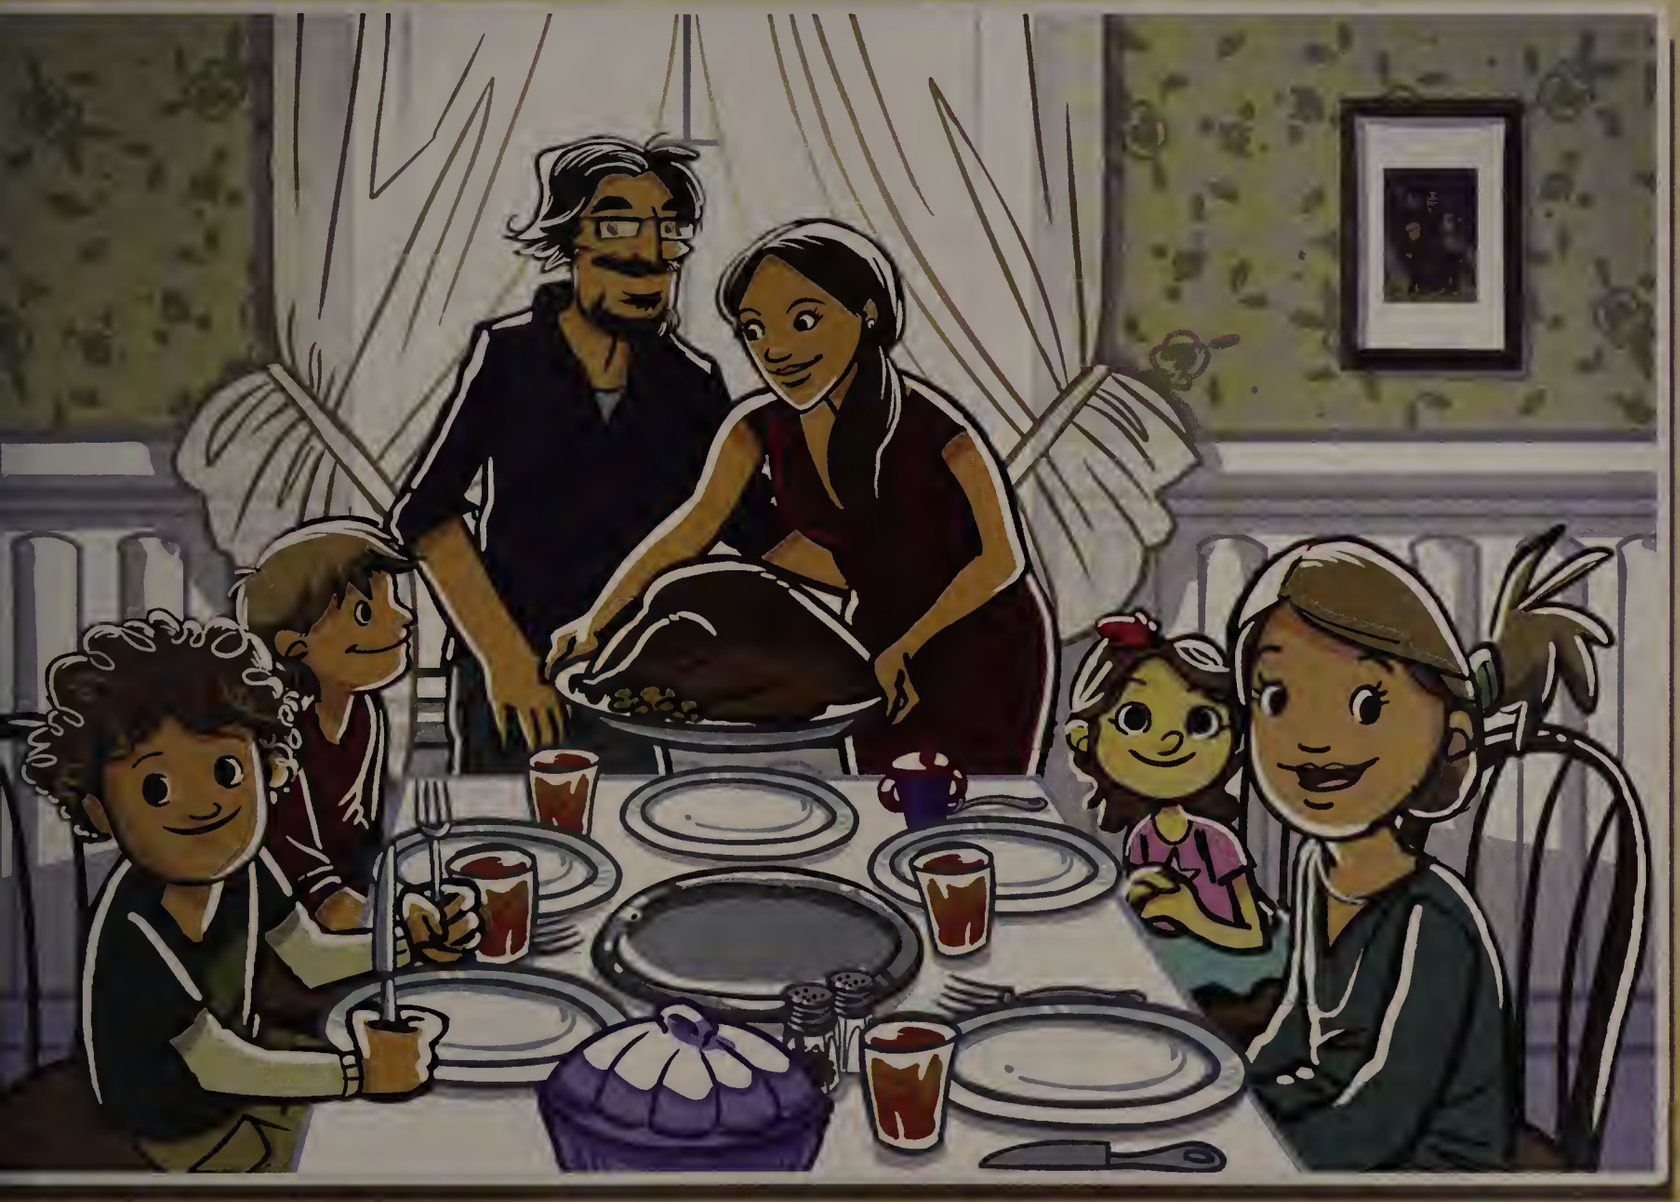
Keaton uses every weathered crease in his brow as Robby, who beats himself up for not putting the pieces together sooner on a story that's been hiding in plain sight for years in a community that deliberately looked the other way. But as The Globe's quiet new editor, Marty Baron (Liev Schreiber), points out, "We spend most of our time stumbling around in the dark. But sometimes, we turn on the light."

Keaton, who's come off of a well-deserved Oscar nomination for last year's Birdman: Or (The Unexpected Virtue of Ignorance), delivers equally strong work here, but he's matched by Ruffalo, whose Rezendes has put so much of himself into his job that he's separated from his (unseen) wife and living in a "shithole," as deputy managing editor Ben Bradlee Jr. (Boston's John Slattery, late of AMC's Mad Men) correctly calls it when he drops by for a beer.

He infuses these old tropes with an urgency that feels so fresh, in a story that feels so timely.

Rounding out the talented actors portraying the Spotlight Team are relative newcomer d'Arcy James, who holds his own as Carroll, a man who discovers an accused priest lives just down the street from his family, and McAdams, whose Pfeiffer may have arrived at The Globe from Ohio, but whose Boston bona-fides include a mother who hails from Southie and a devout Catholic grandmother she's wary of telling what she's working on.

Baron, a self-described outsider, makes the Spotlight Team's story The Globe's priority on his first day there, which prompts a common refrain he's met with throughout the film: "You want to sue the Church?!" After all, the paper has a lot to lose, since 53 percent of their readership is Catholic. However, they also have plenty of integrity, something that's in woefully low supply at lesser papers.



McCarthy, who credits Sidney Lumet's 1982 Paul Newman picture The Verdict as an influence on this film, clearly has learned from that Oscar-nominated drama. As reporters with little more than dogged determination, the unironed shirts on their backs and the cups of cold coffee in their hands dig through old files, chase down leads, wear down sources and deliver enough dialogue to fill five superhero films, what could have been a deathly dull procedural instead becomes thrilling. He infuses these tropes with an urgency that feels so fresh, in a story that feels so timely, that you're almost shocked to see the Spotlight Team break to congregate around a TV in The Globe's newsroom as the horrors of 9/11 unfold, reminding you of how long ago this modern-feeling movie is set. "This is nuts," Carroll says as the Twin Towers burn. "Two days ago, I told my wife we were working on the biggest story on the planet."

Though their local story temporarily moves to the back burner, it soon grows even more in scope. Rather than limit the story by exposing individual priests, they step back and look at the bigger picture, focusing on the entire corrupt system—a decadeslong shell game that found Cardinal Bernard Francis Law (Len Cariou) covering up his priests' misconduct by moving the accused from parish to parish despite repeated allegations of molestation. Quite by accident, the Spotlight Team discovers that "Sick Leave" is an official designation the Church uses for priests who have been reassigned after being accused of sexual abuse—but one of many terms used by the diocese. "Anything but 'rape,'" Pfeiffer observes, with anger in her voice.

Ultimately, what elevates Spotlight above the pictures devoted to so-called superheroes currently clogging cineplexes is McCarthy's refusal to deal in a black-and-white worldview of good versus evil. Not even The Globe itself is free from criticism, demonstrating a key quality that McCarthy shares with his subject: integrity. ◆

GIVERS' NEW TAKE

LOUISIANA INDIE-ROCKERS TACKLE ELECTRO-POP TERRITORY.

TAYLOR GUARISCO EMBRACES MUSICAL freedom, though the singer/guitarist for Louisiana indie-rockers Givers also applies certain rules in the process.

That seeming contradiction took shape when Guarisco and singer/percussionist Tiffany Lamson launched the band in their home city of Lafayette, filling an open night at a local cafe by inviting their musician friends to play an improvised set.

Guarisco, who had toured as a bassist with Cajun and zydeco bands, picked up a guitar. Jazz-trained trumpeter Josh LeBlanc agreed to play bass. And Lamson, who grew up singing in church, stepped out from her recent duties behind a drum kit. And they all sought distance from the funky sounds of New Orleans.

"The first experience with Givers was 'OK, let's try to get everyone dancing but not play any funk music,'" Guarisco says from New Mexico, headed toward a Nov. 17 date at the Sinclair. "These little silent rules that guide where the band goes, a lot of that influence comes from Lafayette, which is a very dance-atmospheric place."

Much of that influence came from the Festival International de Louisiane, a free music fest that takes over Lafayette in April—just before New Orleans' better-known Jazz & Heritage Festival—with an emphasis on world music.

"As kids, we grew up seeing all this amazing music from West Africa," Guarisco says. "The Lafayette influence was that, mixed with all these Cajun and zydeco bands. There was a resurgence in all this music... young bands being more innovative and pushing the envelope of what Cajun music can be."

He joined that renaissance with Cajun group Feufollet and toured with Terrance Simien and the Zydeco Experience. But with Givers, Guarisco and his compadres reflected more of those African influences on the quintet's bright, percolating 2011 debut In Light, which drew comparisons to both Vampire Weekend and Guarisco's favorite band, Dirty Projectors.

"Everybody's different in the band as to what they let in, but part of my stance ... was going into a cave and not letting too much from the outside come in."

So for follow-up New Kingdom, set for a Nov. 13 release, he says that Givers set a new rule: "None of the grooves are going to be Afrobeat or West African, joyful, celebratory music." The resulting album reverberates with synthesizer and drum sampling, sounding closer to a freshly scrubbed electro-pop band.

"We all wanted to make a modern record," Guarisco says, though he doesn't cite specific inspirations. "Everybody's different in the band as to what they let in, but part of my stance in making the record was going into a cave and not letting too much from the outside come in."

Givers again tapped In Light engineer Korey Richey, who added programming and percussion to the band, rounded out by drummer Kirby Campbell and keyboardist Nick Stephan. "We all stepped forward in the production realm, where we were layering things," Guarisco says. He traded guitar and bass with LeBlanc, who brought in MIDI guitar pickups to trigger some of the synth sounds.

Lamson, however, truly comes into her own on New Kingdom. Although she still splits lead vocals with Guarisco, Lamson sails with dynamic, resonant phrasing over the synth-cushioned production.

Their partnership took root in 2005 when Guarisco transferred to the University of New Orleans, where he joined Lamson in undergraduate studies. "We came from the same town, but didn't really know each other in high school," he says. "We said, 'Maybe we'll make some music and jam some time.' Then we became good friends in New Orleans. She had this apartment upstairs from me."

Then, barely three weeks after Guarisco moved in, Hurricane Katrina struck. "I was leaving Friday to play with this Cajun band," he says. "I found out Sunday there was a hurricane, and I was like 'Oh, shit!' Our place had like 20 feet of water!" And that's how he and Lamson landed back in Lafayette.

Those Lafayette roots can be difficult to hear in the sheen of New Kingdom, especially in contrast to Givers' earlier work. However, Guarisco contends, "There are certain moments on the album that feel more Louisiana groove-inspired than the first record." Plus, there's a spoken-word segment by Dr. John on the electro-funky "Sleeper Hold."

Either way, when you're an artist seeking free expression, Guarisco says, "You have to make each step a different one." ◆

IT'S TIME TO RETURN THANKSGIVING TO ITS PILGRIM ROOTS.

MY ONLY NOTABLE HISTORIC ancestor is Mary Dyer, who was hanged on the Common for heresy. You know how she was, ol' Great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-great-aunt Mary—always ready with a joke or some lighthearted heresy. When I tell you that Mary Dyer was hanged, hopefully you learn something: "Hanged" is the correct past tense when you're describing an actual hanging. It doesn't make sense to me any more than it did to Mary Dyer.

Anyway, all this Puritan talk is probably making you hungry. If you're like me, nothing stirs the appetite like stories of hardship for a long-ago religious cult. So I'm going to tell you how to host a great Thanksgiving, but first we need some perspective on a holiday that is beloved and celebrated all around the world.

At the first Thanksgiving, everybody gathered around a really sweet hand-hewn heirloom-quality farmhouse table, but nobody there was named Chase or Avery. Atop that table was a cornucopia of invisible viruses and bacteria, and atop those, a bounteous spread: maize, lobsters, lobster-and-maize stew, maize bread with smeared lobster and, for dessert, lobster-maize cookies with extra maize. It was a time for giving thanks, and not for complaining about one's smallpox, Abigail. Everybody ate until they were stuffed and saying things like, "Verily, I have a total lobster coma," and "I don't think I can eat maize ever again. But of course I will, for it is all we have to sustain us through the deadly cold of the upcoming winter. Can someone tell me again why we didn't land in Fort Lauderdale?" Then they all went outside to throw the ol' lobster around and gaze across the bay at the Cape, where they wished to go for the weekend, but it was all booked up so Plymouth would have to do.

Notably absent in all of this: turkeys. There was no turkey at the first Thanksgiving. But the menus did evolve. In the second year they served lobster stuffed with crab stuffed with oysters stuffed with clams. The dish was called Lobcroylam and it was invented by one of the lesser-known Mayflower voyagers, a pilgrim by the name of Jebediah Maddden. Jebediah died after a local witch cast a spell on him, afflicting him with a terrible curse that made him look like he had gout and a heart attack.

FOR THE BIRDS: You can't have Thanksgiving without turkey—or can you?

But he died as an old man, living to the astonishing age of 34.

Turkey would not feature in Thanksgiving until 1799, when a host had to accommodate a guest with a shellfish allergy. That guest's name: Jebediah Butterball. The rest is history.

Nowadays, turkey is so familiar that you might be bored with it. Well, you eat it once a year, so of course it grows tiresome. How about frying a turkey, then? All you need is a giant open flame and a vat of flammable oil. There's probably not much that could go wrong, but just to be on the safe side, you should contract out your turkey frying to the bomb-disposal unit of your local SWAT team. They'll carefully lower the turkey into the oil, gripping it firmly with robotic pincers operated from an armored van parked 300 yards away. If all goes well, you'll get golden brown, juicy turkey that tastes slightly different than the golden brown, juicy turkey from the oven.

But Thanksgiving isn't just about poultry and grease fires. It's also about family. There's nothing better than getting your whole family together in one place and then giving them a call from your hotel room in Turks and Caicos. I'm kidding—it's prohibitively expensive to fly to the Caribbean over Thanksgiving. You should just drive to Florida and call them from there.

They'll carefully lower the turkey into the oil, gripping it firmly with robotic pincers operated from an armored van parked 300 yards away.

No, not on your real phone, you idiot! Ever heard of GPS tracking? Buy a burner at a truck stop on the way down.

Really, though, everyone loves hanging out with the fam. I asked one of my friends whether his dad was coming over for Thanksgiving, and he said, "No, why? You want him to come to your house?" People are such kidders!

The great thing about Thanksgiving is that it's not commercialized. All you have to buy is $400 worth of groceries and a bunch of that genetically engineered multicolored corn to hang on the door. Plus, a pilgrim hat and an autumn-hued tablecloth and themed goodie bags filled with mini chocolate muskets and Mohegan Sun poker chips. Then there's the photographer to document how much wholesome fun you're having, and the wait staff to carry the gourds, and the turkey wrangler to make sure the live birds on the lawn don't peck any of the children who are out playing touch football as required by Massachusetts state law. OK, sure, I blow 10 grand when it's all said and done. But all you really need is food, loved ones and the turkey wrangler. That one's really non-negotiable, for liability reasons.

Now, as Mary Dyer might've said, merry Christmas! ◆

SOUND ADVICE ON ANNOYING INTERNS, PUSHY PARENTS AND STINGY PALS.

JOHN D. SPOONER IS AN INVESTMENT ADVISER, author and novelist. His most recent book is No One Ever Told Us That: Money and Life Lessons for Young Adults. Here, he responds to queries from advice seekers of all ages. Send your conundrums to thedance@improper.com

I am a receptionist, and my company hires interns every summer. Most of the interns are completely polite. However, one young man is consistently disrespectful and has a pompous demeanor. Once he even asked me to take out his trash, which is definitely not my job. I've consulted my superiors, and they don't seem to care. I'm not asking for much, but I don't deserve to feel belittled at my job, for which I am well-qualified. How can I earn more respect at my company? First of all, as for the wiseguy intern: "Entitlement" is my least favorite word. I hear many complaints about the younger generation on this subject. But I wouldn't worry about it. Life has a way of beating this word out of their systems as the reality of adulthood creeps in. Most likely, this intern got the job because his parents were friendly with someone in management at your company. Entitlement.

If you're the receptionist, you're likely good with people, which means you have a few friends who may be key people, rainmakers, the producers of business at your company. Tell your story to your favorite friend who has some power. Let him or her go to management and tell them about the intern's outrageous behavior. The boss will come to you for confirmation. And the boss will be forced into action, have a grown-up talk with the intern and perhaps even report to the parents that their entitled son is not perfect in the eyes of others.

It will be good for everyone involved. And your boss will pay a little more attention to you. No one is immune from the dreaded HR department, not even interns with connections.

I am in my early 30s, and I'm starting to think I may need a lawyer someday, an accountant and even someone to help me with my money. My parents can be pretty controlling and tell me that they have those people covered for me and that they want me to have the best. I'm not so sure that's the best path for me. What's your take? Good for you for thinking about this subject. One of the most important things you should pay attention to in life is building your own team of experts to take care of you in the three areas where you'll need the most help: medical, legal and financial matters. This should be a two-step process for you.

The first step would be for you to make an appointment to meet the people who have taken care of your parents. They won't know it, but you'll be interviewing them. Ask them a little bit about their backgrounds and why they entered their respective professions. Don't take too much of their time. But everyone loves to talk about themselves, and their personal stories will tell you a lot about their character—and whether you want to do business with them. If these people are real, they'll take the time with the next generation.

If you choose to look for your own professionals to help you, I would look for recommendations from your friends. If this fails, reach out to the smartest older people you know. They may be friends of your family; they may be people you respect. But your most successful relationships will come from personal contacts, not from lists on a screen.

My friends are so cheap. I feel like we can never have a good time together because we have nothing to do. Of course, I understand that people want to save money, but lunch with friends, in my opinion, is worth spending on. Sure, there are free things, but I've lived here for years, and I'm looking for something new. How can I catch up with my friends since they refuse to go on outings with me? Every relationship changes over time, marriage and friendships especially. My great friends from grammar school are long gone from my life. The same is true of high school. There are people I care very much about from those years. If we run into each other by accident, we hug and memories flood back, laughter and tears. Then we move on, knowing that the old times were formative, loving even. But they're gone, ships that pass in the night. The same is true for people's boyfriends and girlfriends. Here's what I usually hear about that subject. "So, I just saw Jimmy, my junior prom date from high school. He was so cute you wouldn't believe it. Now you should see what he looks like, and it's not cute. Plus, he was so boring."

This is a long way of saying that you may be outgrowing your friends. If they're great at entertaining at home, maybe that's a good route, though that costs money too. As do the movies, bowling and drinks at a bar. Maybe, if you still enjoy these people, you can insist on a restaurant outing just once a month—a special treat.

We need life around us. If your old friends don't understand this, maybe it's time to move on. Money spent on relaxing time can be well worth the expense. ◆

Soroff On / Nick Offerman

NO DUNCE

THE MULTITALENTED ACTOR TALKS ABOUT HIS NEW ROLE, HIS CULTURAL EDUCATION AND HIS FAMED FACIAL HAIR.

ACTOR, MASTER WOODWORKER, WRITER AND humorist Nick Offerman, 45, is starring as Ignatius J. Reilly in the Huntington Theatre Company's world premiere production of A Confederacy of Dunces, an adaptation of the Pulitzer-winning novel playing at the BU Theatre Nov. 11-Dec. 20. A native of Minooka, Illinois, Offerman studied acting at the University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign and has appeared in numerous films and television shows, including Parks and Recreation, on which he played Ron Swanson. He is working on his third book and operates the Offerman Woodshop in Los Angeles, where he lives with his wife, Will & Grace actress Megan Mullally.

JONATHAN SOROFF: What's your favorite episode of Parks and Recreation?
NICK OFFERMAN: Number-one favorite episode is entitled "Ron and Tammy," and it's the first appearance of Megan as my batshit-crazy ex-wife. It's just a magnificent script by Mike Scully from The Simpsons, who had his own bitter divorce to draw upon. It was a life-changing moment to get to work for the first time with my wife as a full-on comedy equal. Number-two favorite episode is called "Leslie and Ron," which was in the last season, and it was like a one-act play with just me and Amy Poehler. Getting to do 20 minutes of TV with her was an incredible gift.

How close politically and philosophically are you to Ron Swanson? Well, pretty close. People get a little confused about that character. They tend to think that he's more of a John Wayne backward type, and he's actually quite progressive in his libertarianism. He's a great feminist. I think that he would not come down on the side of the NRA on gun issues. He's a decent and wise man. But the thing I share most with him is being a man of few words. I like to think we both don't suffer fools gladly, and that includes ourselves.

Was A Confederacy of Dunces always a favorite book of yours? I grew up in a small town in Illinois that was rather bereft of popular culture beyond the most mainstream. So it wasn't until I got to college in 1988 that I was handed The White Album and David Lynch and William S. Burroughs. And it was in my first semester that I read A Confederacy of Dunces. All these much more worldly theater kids took a shine to me, because I could build scenery, and they said, "Read this, smoke this, check this out." Of course, I was smitten with it, but it never occurred to me that Ignatius J. Reilly would be a role that I could play, until I realized I'd played these petulant characters, including Ron Swanson, who throws a tantrum when there's no bacon.

What are the biggest differences between the novel and the play? Well, what's so magnificent about the book is that it's such a sprawling description of the nooks and crannies of the early-'60s French Quarter of New Orleans, but it doesn't have a straightforward narrative. That's what's made it so difficult for all the attempts at making it into a film. The adaptation we're working with manages to take the chaos and distill it into a double love story, hopefully without leaving out any of the major details that its devotees love about it.

Have you ever supported yourself as a woodworker, or is it a hobby? I paid for a couple of years of college by framing houses, and I began working at the theater scene shop for wages. I was always swingin' a hammer to pay for things. That was my in. I was very bad at acting when I started, and I couldn't get cast, but my friends fortunately wanted me around because I could build things. So I owe my acting career to it in many ways.

"I was always swingin' a hammer to pay for things. That was my in. I was very bad at acting when I started, and I couldn't get cast."

Favorite thing you ever made? Probably the first canoe I ever built: 18 feet, made of cedar, hardwood trim. It just felt like it was rife with wizardry as well as wood and glue. Making a table or chair feels magnificently powerful for the simple reason that you don't have to sit on the floor and you have someplace to put your beer. But making a canoe and then paddling it down a river made me feel like I'd done something magical.

Which woodworkers do you most admire? I'm working on my third book, which is about my shop and woodworking, and I'm hoping to meet and interview some of my heroes, like Mira Nakashima. She's the daughter of George Nakashima, and he and Sam Maloof are kinda considered the two biggest rock stars who created their own artistic styles. But in Boston, there's an incredible school, the North Bennet Street School, which is maybe the oldest and certainly the finest trade school in America, and I revere that place.

Will we ever see you clean-shaven? Sure. I'm a character actor. The character I'm most known for happens to have had a mustache, but he's only one iteration of the stuff I've done, and there are plenty of roles in TV and movies where I have no facial hair. I just did a movie with Michael Keaton called The Founder that'll be out next year, where I have a high-and-tight and I'm super clean-shaven. I'm thrilled that the career of my mustache took off like it did, and in this play I have one too, but I welcome roles where I don't have one.

Does Megan like it? She thankfully does. She's very meticulous and has incredibly fine taste, so it doesn't really follow that she should be a big fan of my unruly whiskers. But perhaps it's because she's so refined that it's an escape for her to lose herself in the brambles of my face.

Who swears more, you or Megan? Probably me, but she gives me a run for my money. The combination of being a laborer and having hit my thumb with a hammer a lot, along with working in the entertainment industry, lends itself to a colorful vocabulary. But one of the things about Megan with which I was first smitten was her filthy sense of humor. When we first met, I'd call my best friend almost daily to say, "Listen to what she said about my balls today."

Should your song "Pussy and Weed" be up for a Grammy? I don't understand why that was not a No. 1 Billboard hit.

Are you a big weed smoker? I have been. I always enjoy intoxicants, but it's interesting. Before my dreams came true vocationally, I had a lot more time to smoke and go into the woods. Now that's a treat I have to work into my life. Also, there's an escapism to it, and I've been so lucky that I don't have as much need for escapism. ◆

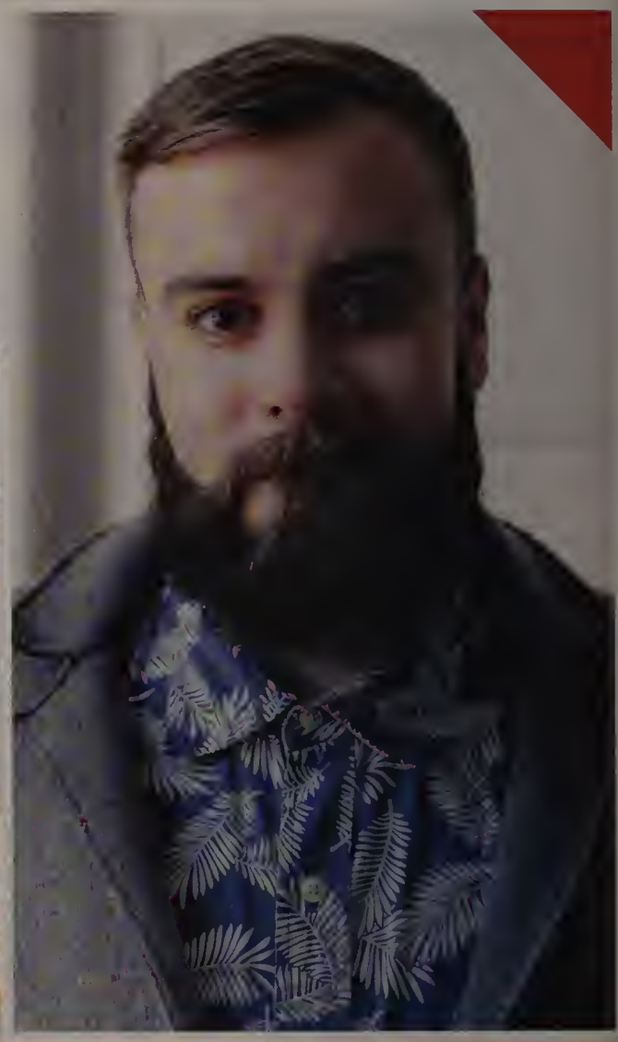
Liquid Assets



BY MC Slim JB • PHOTOGRAPHED BY Adam DeTour

It's an astonishing and wondrous time to be a drinker in Boston. In a town where it was once hard to find a properly made Negroni, never mind a nip of Fernet-Branca, tipplers can now patronize establishments large and small that sling serious drinks, where bartenders channel the spirit of the pre-Prohibition halcyon era of cocktails and the 1930s advent of high-craft Tiki drinks. Better yet, there's a culture of innovation at work, a community of artisans feeding off each other to exploit our century's unprecedented global array of intriguing spirits, fortified and aromatized wines, bitters, syrups and shrubs, plus a botanical garden's worth of fresh fruits, herbs and spices. Every new indie restaurant seems to open with a serious bar program; bartenders increasingly rely on their kitchens for novel culinary elements to dazzle jaded palates. Stifle that Fireball or dirty vodka martini order for a moment, and consider the offerings of this array of bartending talents both grizzled and fresh-faced. And thank your lucky stars you arrived on time for Boston's new Golden Age of Cocktails.

"This Hojoko original has a structure that I really like. In essence, it's a split-base Old Fashioned that pairs an overproof spirit with a complementary, low-proof but intensely flavored fortified wine. The shiitake mushroom absinthe accentuates the woody, earthy notes of the Madeira, adding depth and hints of umami."

DAREN SWISHER of HOJOKO

Like the Japanese after-work taverns that inspired it, this raucous new spot in the Verb Hotel near Fenway Park prizes good drinking as much as good eating. The kitchen turns out marvelous sushi and sashimi, charcoal-grilled skewers, ramen and more; the cocktail list alternates goofy party drinks (frozen White Russian, anyone?) with serious craft concoctions. Working the latter idiom, Mr. Swisher deftly underscores a hoary classic with a surprising culinary element to subtle, dreamy effect.

Budokan

- 1 oz. Hamilton 151 Demerara Overproof rum
- 1 oz. Sandeman Rainwater Madeira
- 1 bar spoon 2:1 Demerara gomme syrup
- 1 dash Angostura bitters

Stir ingredients over ice in a mixing glass and strain into a chilled double Old Fashioned glass rinsed with housemade shiitake-infused absinthe

TAINAH SOARES of TRINA'S STARLITE LOUNGE

"This cocktail is all about layers of flavors and simplicity. I really enjoy making tropical/Tiki cocktails, so as fall approached, I wanted to create something that held onto summer flavors, but still felt very warming. As much as I enjoy getting creative with a million different ingredients, it's really rewarding to create something that is simple and yet so delicious."

Trina's keeps killing it on the Camberville line near Inman by serving homey fare (think glorified hot dogs and chicken 'n' waffles) at really nice prices with zero pretension. You're doing something right if throngs of restaurant workers use a precious off-day to patronize your Monday brunch. No surprise, then, that the cocktails, like Ms. Soares' clever Tiki-inspired drink, are also a magnet for your favorite servers, bartenders and cooks. Trust the pros on this one.

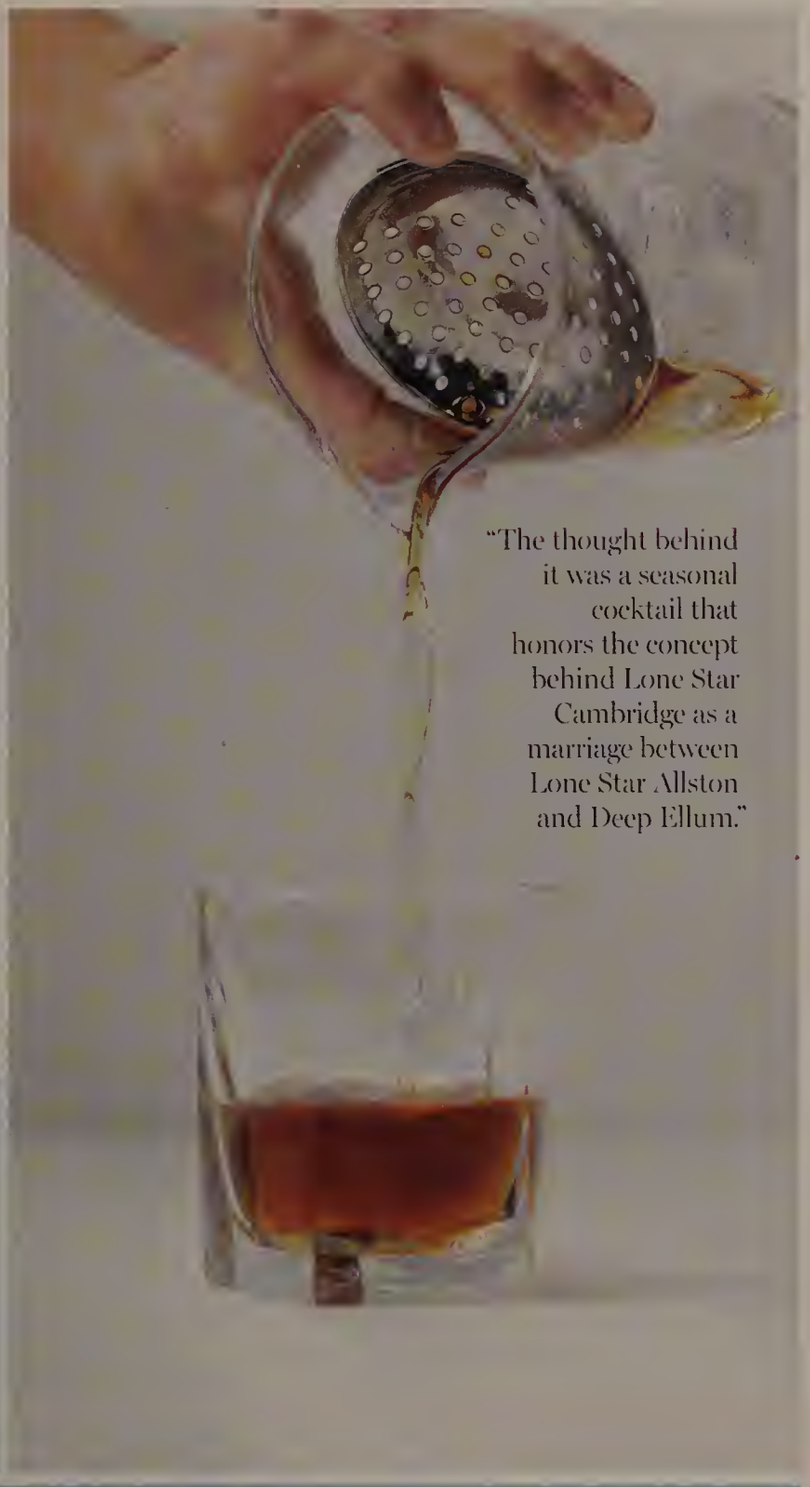
Dashboard Hula Girl

- 1½ oz. pineapple- and vanilla-bean-infused El Dorado 8-Year Cask-Aged rum
- ¾ oz. Amaro Averna
- ¾ oz. Lustau Los Arcos amontillado sherry
- Flamed orange peel

Combine the spirits in a pint glass, add ice and stir until properly diluted. Pour into a chilled cocktail glass, flame the orange peel, rub it on the rim of the glass and discard the peel.

"I love this drink for the way the bitter florality of the Suze moderates the vegetal, earthy sweetness of the rhum agricole and smoked celery agave. The grapefruit zest lends a great deal to the balance, making it really approachable for a straight-spirit cocktail."

DAN PONTIUS of ALDEN & HARLOW



Wood smoke and umami permeate many dishes at chef Michael Scelfo's acclaimed Harvard Square restaurant, and his kitchen contributes useful ingredients to the bar's superb craft cocktail program. The scholarly Mr. Pontius harnesses both accents in this drink, deftly moderating the challenging funkiness of rhum agricole with a smooth unaged cachaça and some oddball components—what, you don't know Suze, either?—to create a witty original.

Still Life

- 1½ oz. Rhum J.M agricole blanc
- 1 oz. Suze aperitif liqueur
- ½ oz. Avuá cachaça prata
- ¼ oz smoked celery agave nectar

Build in a chilled lowball glass and stir with a large, hand-cut ice cube. Garnish with a long, rough grapefruit peel

"The thought behind it was a seasonal cocktail that honors the concept behind Lone Star Cambridge as a marriage between Lone Star Allston and Deep Ellum."

NICOLE TRAVERS of LONE STAR TACO BAR CAMBRIDGE

East Cambridge was recently blessed with an outpost of Allston's Lone Star Taco Bar, which has brought its fine take on casual Mexican and border food and great beer list to a rollicking, tight (bordering on cramped), affordable package. Better yet, it dragged along the craft cocktail sublimity of Lone Star's sister restaurant Deep Ellum, as evidenced by Ms. Travers' complex, aged-tequila-based riff on an herbally amplified Manhattan.

La Niña Fresa

- 1 ½ oz. reposado tequila
- ¾ oz. Cocchi Americano Rosa aperitif wine
- ½ oz. Carpano Antica sweet vermouth
- ¼ oz. housemade rosemary syrup
- 1 dash Scrappy's or housemade cardamom bitters
- 1 dash Regan's Orange Bitters No. 6 or housemade orange bitters

Stir over ice; strain into an Old Fashioned glass. Garnish with a spritz of orange oil

"This is a drink Matthew Schrage and I collaborated on during our time together at Brick & Mortar. It's a spirit-forward, stirred whiskey cocktail that really exemplifies the drinks I like to make and drink."

NIC MANSUR of SHEPARD

Perched between Porter and Harvard Squares, newcomer Shepard leverages the work of long-venerated culinary talents Susan Regis and René Becker to deliver a sensational, ultra-seasonally focused New American menu with refined French technique. At the bar, Mr. Mansur echoes their devotion to great ingredients and clear flavors with this muscular, deceptively simple, well-balanced cocktail. Notorious Hollywood hell-raiser Sam Peckinpah would doubtless have approved.

Duck, You Sucka

- 2 ¼ oz Wild Turkey 101-proof bourbon
- ½ oz. Amaro Averna
- ¼ oz Luxardo maraschino liqueur
- 2 dashes of Angostura aromatic bitters

Serve on the rocks; garnish with a twist of lemon.

MOE ISAZA of THE BALDWIN BAR

The meteoric career of self-taught wunderkind Ran Duan continues upward at the Baldwin Bar in Woburn's Sichuan Garden II, whose upstairs room recalls a genteel British officers' club in mid-century Burma. When you're busy collecting international awards for your wildly creative cocktails, it's smart to hire highly skilled lieutenants like Mr. Isaza, who shares Duan's penchant for channeling the ghost of ur-Tiki master Donn Beach. Share an Uber with friends and get there now

Guantanamera

- 2 muddled fresh strawberries
- 1 ½ oz. Bacardi Gold rum
- ¾ oz fresh lime juice
- ½ oz. Cocchi Vermouth di Torino
- ½ oz. Giffard Sirop de Orgeat
- ½ oz. housemade coconut cream

Shake over ice and strain into a double Old Fashioned glass packed with ice (preferably crushed). Top with a float of Peychaud's bitters and freshly grated nutmeg.

ROB HOOVER of LA BRASA

Chef Daniel Bojorquez's East Somerville restaurant brings a novel sophistication (and plenty of terrific wood-fueled grilling, roasting and smoking) to a neighborhood that previously lacked modern, upscale cookery. The bar here nicely meets the demands of its diverse, arty crowd with a geeky beer list, carefully curated wines and a thoughtful cocktail program. Here, Mr. Hoover offers an original that the waitstaff describes as a "sort of fall margarita," to his nodding approval.

Benny Profane

- ¾ oz. Lunazul blanco tequila
- ¾ oz. fresh lime juice
- ¾ oz. Aperol
- ½ oz. Cardamaro
- ¼ oz. Amaro Meletti

Shake over ice and strain into a chilled cocktail glass.

"This cocktail is named after a character in a novel by Thomas Pynchon, whose writing was simultaneously educated and irreverent: a perfect corollary for our cocktail list. It has five ingredients (two more than I prefer): tequila and lime as the foundation, rounded out with a trio of Italian bitters. The result is bright, tart and accessible—Aperol and Meletti lend a sweet, floral aspect, while Cardamaro adds a grassy, almost haylike quality."

"Smoke & Sherry reflects my love for rye whiskey as well as the smoke and wood fire that is at the heart of the food at the Backroom. The cherries and their syrup are smoked alongside the brisket; amontillado sherry balances the sweetness with notes of oak, nuts and subtle acidity. The rinse hits your nose first and fools the brain into thinking you are about to drink a peaty Scotch cocktail."

ANA BORRAS of THE BACKROOM AT MOODY'S

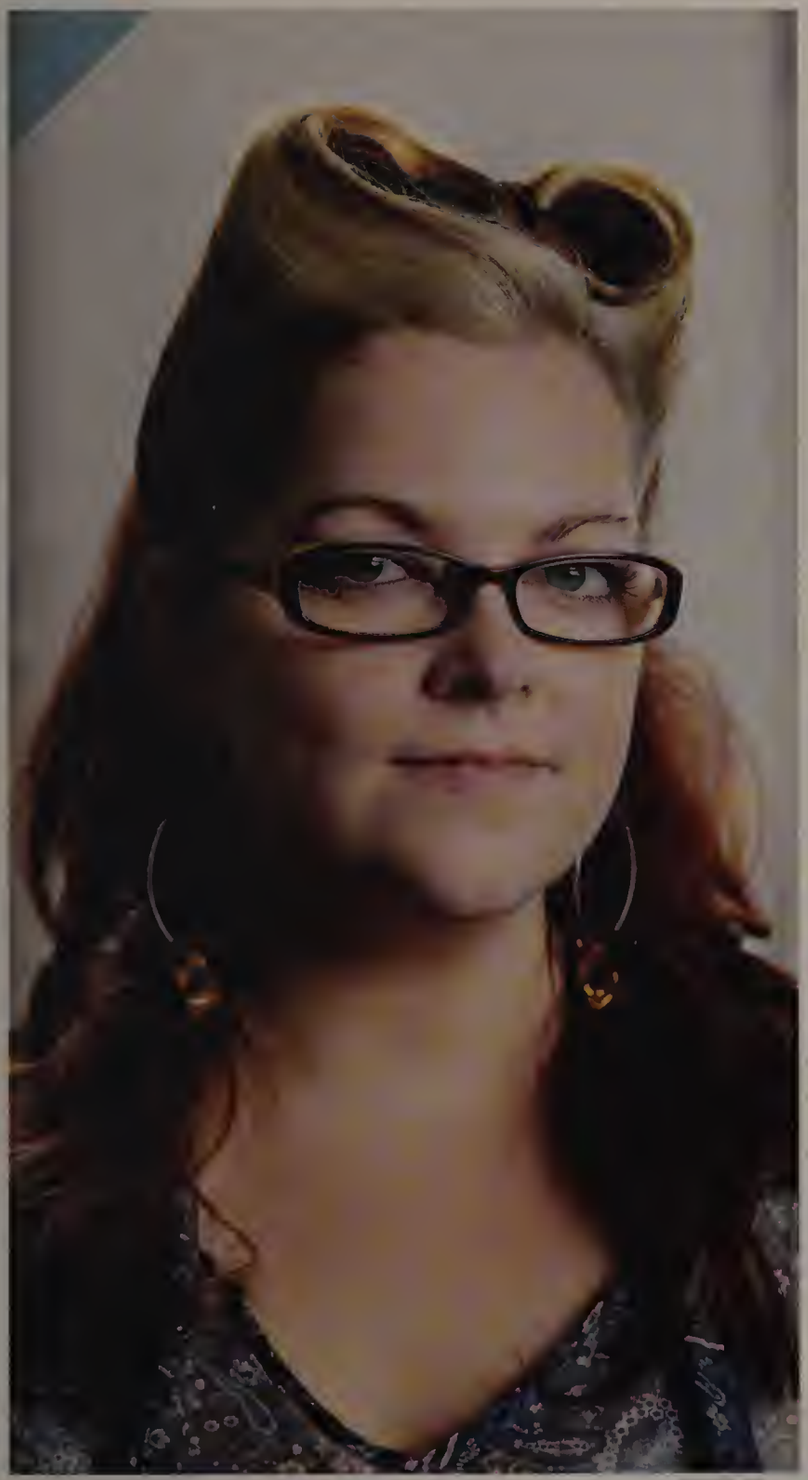
We've long touted Moody's Delicatessen & Provisions in Waltham as Greater Boston's only destination deli. Then it added the Backroom, a full-service restaurant that makes great use of a gorgeous wood-fired oven in addition to the swoony cured, smoked and pickled fare produced on-site. Gilding the lily is a comfy bar that slings precisely made, fabulous drinks, several of which revel in the kitchen's winning way with wood smoke, as in the gifted Ms. Borras' rye-and-sherry creation

Smoke & Sherry

- 2 oz. Old Overholt rye whiskey
- ½ oz. Lustau Los Arcos amontillado sherry
- 2 dashes Angostura bitters
- 8 drops Crude "Pooter" Smoke & Salt bitters
- ½ oz. smoked Luxardo maraschino cherry syrup
- Lagavulin 16-Year-Old Islay Single-Malt Scotch whisky for the rinse

Stir rye, sherry, both bitters and cherry syrup over ice in a mixing glass. Strain into a chilled Old Fashioned glass that has been rinsed with a dash of the Scotch. Garnish with a Luxardo maraschino cherry

"I created this for a guest at Yvonne's, naming it after cross streets near my grandparents' Waltham home. It's a cocktail for autumn, easily the best time of year in New England: a colder-weather drink, higher in alcohol and bittersweet with apple and walnut. Changes in season let you dust off ingredients and cocktails you weren't making as frequently the rest of the year."



SEAN SULLIVAN of YVONNE'S

Rising from the ashes of legendary old-money institution Locke-Ober, Yvonne's blends cheeky nightclub glamour with envious nostalgia for a vanishing Boston Brahmin refinement. The extravagantly accomplished Mr. Sullivan works the more sedate of the two rooms—library-themed, equipped with old L-O fixtures and a fireplace—and pours a potion that embodies Yvonne's white-hot fusion of elegantly antique and fiercely of-the-moment. Lines are already out the door, better book your table for next month today.

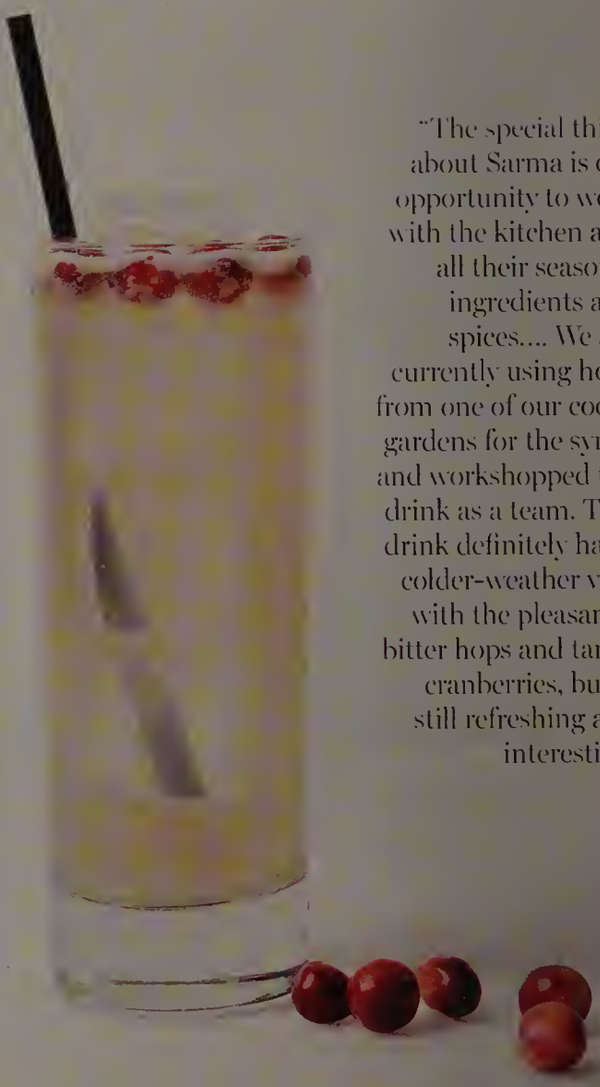
Walnut & Moody

- 1½ oz. Old Grand-Dad 114-proof bourbon
- ¾ oz. Laird's Old Apple Brandy
- ½ oz. Nux Alpina walnut liqueur
- ¼ oz Demerara simple syrup

Stir over ice, strain into an Old Fashioned glass and garnish with freshly grated orange zest

"I love this right now because the flavor combination is familiar—apples, subtle spice and citrus—but they're usually served warm in a mug of cider, as opposed to a glass of sparkling wine. It's a refreshing, slightly bitter beverage that's perfect for fall."

MELISSA BENSON of TOWNSMAN



Chef/owner Matt Jennings' blazing-hot restaurant at the edge of the Financial District, with its extraordinary menu centered on charcuterie and raw bar, happily debuted last winter with real craft cocktails. Ms. Benson's technique and hospitality have helped make its sizzling bar and lounge an after-work and late-night destination in its own right, as has her creativity, on display in this potent, very modern take on a Champagne cocktail.

King Charlemagne

- 1 ¼ oz. Lecompte Calvados Pays d'Auge Originel
- ½ oz. Bénédictine liqueur
- ¼ oz. Amaro Nonino
- 3 oz. NV Bailly-Lapierre brut sparkling wine

Chill the spirits, combine in a glass, top with sparkling wine and garnish with an orange coin

"The special thing about Sarma is our opportunity to work with the kitchen and all their seasonal ingredients and spices.... We are currently using hops from one of our cooks' gardens for the syrup and workshopped the drink as a team. This drink definitely has a colder-weather vibe, with the pleasantly bitter hops and tangy cranberries, but is still refreshing and interesting."

HILLARY NEUMAN of SARMA

Sarma won Restaurant of the Year in The Improper's Boston's Best issue this summer for a few reasons, starting with chef Cassie Piuma's vivid, Turkish-centric, Mediterranean-spanning menu of small plates and a lively, casual vibe that suits its Somerville neighborhood perfectly. But we also love its terrific bar program, exemplified by Ms. Neuman's smoky, bracing original that garners a fascinating floral bitterness via a unique syrup from the kitchen's eclectic larder.

Joint Custody

- 1½ oz. Del Maguey Vida mezcal
- ½ oz. fresh lemon juice
- ½ oz. housemade hop syrup
- 10 fresh cranberries, muddled, plus more for garnish

Shake all ingredients over ice; double-strain into a highball glass with fresh ice. Top with soda. Stir 3–4 cranberries into the glass.

"My drinks tend to venture on the savory side, but I try to create cocktails that have a balance of different tastes: sweet, sour, salty, bitter. The Longenbach features all of those, and sherry, one of my favorite ingredients."

SAHIL MEHTA of ESTRAGON

The courtly, genteel Mr. Mehta has tallied at least two remarkable achievements at the South End's lovely, traditional Spanish taberna Estragon. One, he was a groundbreaking pioneer of the currently voguish sherry-based cocktail, exemplified here. Two, he assembled a brilliant, refined cocktail program within the straitjacket of a beer/wine/cordial license. We can't wait to see what he does with Estragon's recent upgrade to a full liquor license.

Longenbach

- 1½ oz. Lustau Papirusa manzanilla sherry
- 1½ oz. Cynar
- ½ oz. St-Germain elderflower liqueur
- ½ oz. fresh lime juice
- 1-inch piece of celery
- Celery salt and honey-ginger crystals for the rim (optional)

AGENDA for 11/11–11/24

Fly High

Circa's Opus glides into town.

LEAVE THE KIDS AT home for a performance of Opus, because the latest production by Australian contemporary circus troupe Circa is no Big Apple Circus. Opus melds high art with circus arts, featuring music by Russian composer Dmitri Shostakovich, played live on stage by the Debussy String Quartet. The musicians will perform a portion of the program blindfolded while Circa's 14 acrobats fly above and around them—one feat features a female acrobat walking atop the heads of her male troupe members and dropping into a full split—adding yet another level of drama to a boundary-pushing show. Forgo the big top in favor of the Shubert Theatre when Circa comes to town Nov. 13-15. / Alexandra Cavallo

Circa's Opus plays on Nov. 13 at 7:30 pm, Nov. 14 at 8 pm and Nov. 15 at 3 pm at the Shubert Theatre, 265 Tremont St., Boston. $35-$75. celebrityseries.org

HIGH SCHOOL HEARTBREAK

Now two of Wes Anderson's most relied-upon actors, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray got their first chance to work for the director as on-screen rivals in his sophomore film, Rushmore, a '90s classic that's back on the big screen for the Coolidge Corner Theatre's Rewind! series. Schwartzman plays Max Fischer, an overzealous 10th-grader whose many extracurriculars extend to matters of the heart when he starts crushing on a new teacher. But when a classmate's father (Murray) is also smitten, it means all-out war. Play teacher's pet when Rushmore screens on Nov. 19, and for extra credit, head across the street for the Rewind! after-party at Osaka. / Carly Olson

Reviews by Brett Michel

Black Mass ★★ If there's one thing journeyman director Scott Cooper (Crazy Heart) gets right in this adaptation of former Boston Globe reporters Dick Lehr and Gerard O'Neill's nonfiction best-seller, it's the puggish, lived-in faces of his supporting cast—like the murderous members of James "Whitey" Bulger's notorious Winter Hill Gang, Rory Cochrane's Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and Jesse Plemons' Kevin Weeks. Alas, Mark Mallouk and Jez Butterworth's screenplay uses their first-person confessions as a framing device, only to drop it just as nonchalantly as Cooper drops Catherine Greig—Sienna Miller was filmed playing Whitey's girlfriend, but she's nowhere onscreen, one of many reasons the movie fails to find the man behind the mobster. Or rather, the man behind the makeup: As Bulger, Johnny Depp never cracks that devilish Whitey smile, probably because he's buried his matinee-idol looks under an immobile mound of prosthetics. And ice-blue contacts make him look more dead than alive—which also describes the film as a whole. It could have been a potent exploration of brotherhood, both literal and figurative (with Benedict Cumberbatch as Billy Bulger and Joel Edgerton as Whitey's townie FBI protector, John Connolly). Instead, Black Mass becomes a movie focused on bullet points rather than hits, chronological reporting lacking any depth or authorial control. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

Bridge of Spies ★★★ A handsome dramatization of real events that took place during the late '50s and early '60s, Steven Spielberg's latest finds him returning to the talents of one of his (and America's) favorite leading men, Tom Hanks. For their fourth collaboration, Hanks slips comfortably back into Jimmy Stewart's old shoes as modern cinema's everyman. He's Cold War hero James B. Donovan, who's tapped as the defense attorney for accused spy Rudolf Ivanovich Abel (Mark Rylance), a British-born Soviet arrested in Brooklyn during the film's masterful, wordless prologue. "Everyone will hate me," says Donovan, who realizes what will happen to his reputation when he defends one of the most hated men in the country, "but at least I'll lose." Much of the understated humor—from the snappy patter to the enjoyably eccentric characters Donovan encounters once he's recruited by the CIA to arrange a spy exchange that drives the second half—comes from a script credited to the Coen brothers and Matt Charman. Still, it's Spielberg's earnestness and faith in our democracy that shows through. It may be set during the height of the Cold War, but the movie's subtext is progressively modern; freedom isn't truly free if you value national security and state secrets over our Constitution. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square, Somerville, West Newton and in the suburbs.)

Brooklyn ★★★1/2 This disarming romantic drama from director John Crowley (Boy A) benefits just as much from a starmaking performance by Saoirse Ronan (The Lovely Bones) as it does from a script by novelist Nick Hornby, who's built a solid second career adapting other people's works of fiction into films. In this case, Hornby has condensed Colm Tóibín's Brooklyn, a best-seller about a young Irish immigrant who leaves her small town when an Irish priest in Brooklyn offers to sponsor a move to America, which promises a better future in the hard years after World War II. Eilis Lacey (Ronan) doesn't want to leave her mother and sister behind, but job prospects are slim, so she boards a boat and settles into a job at a Brooklyn department store. Her profound homesickness is eased when she meets Tony (The Place Beyond the Pines' Emory Cohen), an Italian-American plumber who falls hard for her, even if she's not a Dodgers fan. But Eilis' new life is threatened when her sponsoring priest (Jim Broadbent) arrives with devastating news from home. Hornby compresses a bit too much into the third act, but Ronan eases any missteps with her luminous presence. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Burnt ★★ At first glance, this comedic drama directed by John Wells (August: Osage County) would appear to be a big-screen update of Fox's short-lived Kitchen Confidential. The 2005 TV series based on Anthony Bourdain's book starred pre-fame cooking enthusiast Bradley Cooper as a bad-boy chef. But even though this movie reunites Cooper with Sienna Miller, his costar from the massively popular American Sniper, it might not have made it past the pilot stage if it had been made for TV. Cooper plays Adam Jones, one-time enfant terrible of the Paris food scene, a two-star Michelin chef who lost everything when his taste for booze, drugs and women eclipsed his godlike palate. Drying out in Louisiana during a year spent shucking a million oysters, he dreamed of returning to London, determined to earn that elusive third star and join the ranks of the greats. If only he weren't such an unlikable prick. Ah, but the script, written by Steven Knight (Locke) and based on a story by Michael Kalesniko (Bourdain wasn't consulted; Mario Batali was), makes Jones a hero that everyone eventually worships, even if he has more issues than Sniper's Chris Kyle. At least his food looks tasty. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crimson Peak ★★1/2 "Ghosts are real," aspiring author Edith Cushing (Alice in Wonderland's Mia Wasikowska) says at the outset of director and co-writer Guillermo del Toro's latest, which he terms a "gothic romance." Well, he's certainly got the gothic part down, with production design that pulls you into the odd goings-on in Allerdale Hall, a decrepit old manse in the English countryside that's slowly sinking into the blood-red clay below and inhabited by strange siblings Thomas and Lucille Sharpe, played by Tom Hiddleston and Jessica Chastain (terrific, both). Alas, the romance is rather tepid, and if you're expecting a ghost story—and who wouldn't be after the 10-year-old Edith (Sofia Wells) is visited by the rotting specter of her dead mother in the prologue, which is set around a century ago—you may be disappointed, as del Toro lets his true intentions be known when the film jumps ahead 14 years. Meeting with a publisher, Edith pitches her short fiction: "It's not a ghost story... it's a story with a ghost in it, but the ghost is a metaphor for the past." That about sums up the film. But, oh, that production design! (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

The Intern ★★★1/2 If there's something to be gleaned from movies like The Martian and this wonderful new comedy from writer/director Nancy Meyers (Something's Gotta Give), it's that films don't need villains to remain interesting. And the characters within don't need to struggle to be better people when they're pretty damn great to begin with. I'm not sure why many people don't seem to like Anne Hathaway, but as Jules Ostin, the successful, overwhelmed owner of an online fashion site, she's as good as ever. The real surprise here is Robert De Niro, who's been phoning it in for at least 15 years now. As Ben Whittaker, a 70-year-old widower who's become restless in retirement, he anchors the film with a subtle performance, and it's terrific to see him actually acting again. When Ben sees an ad looking for a "senior intern," the career company man jumps at the opportunity to join Jules' operation. The 30-something CEO doesn't want anything to do with this nattily dressed geezer at first, but he gradually, organically becomes a friend and confidante. Sure, there are brief misunderstandings between the two, but that's it for conflict. What remains is the radical idea of spending time with good people. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Martian ★★★★ Raise your hand if you've heard this one before: Matt Damon plays an astronaut who's stranded alone on an inhospitable planet, and he's willing to do just about anything to get back home to Earth. OK, put your hand down, because The Martian isn't Interstellar. It's better. In Ridley Scott's realistically science-minded triumph, the charming actor plays Mark Watney, who's abandoned and left for dead during a mission on Mars. A splendid adaptation of Andy Weir's speculative-fiction novel, this 3-D marvel focuses on Mark's efforts to stay alive. It will take four years for a rescue mission to reach him, and even with rationing, his food supply will only last a year. "Luckily, I'm a botanist," Mark says during one of his many video log entries, a device that allows the innately likable Damon to address the audience directly through much of the film; we believe in Mark as he concludes, "I'm gonna have to science the shit out of this." Does he ever. But rather than play things for suspense, as Alfonso Cuarón did in 2013's Gravity, the 77-year-old Scott presents his picture as a paean to the enduring spirit of man's ingenuity against overwhelming odds. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

The Peanuts Movie ★★1/2 The late Charles M. Schulz's beloved comic strip is brought into the digital age in the Peanuts gang's big-screen, 3-D, computer-animated debut, directed by Steve Martino (Ice Age: Continental Drift). All of your favorites are here, from Charlie Brown to his faithful dog Snoopy, as are tropes from the countless animated TV specials that were produced from 1965 onward. Snoopy is still battling imaginary nemesis the Red Baron, Lucy is still doling out five-cent psychiatric advice and Charlie still pines for the Little Red-Haired Girl. Fact is, the film's biggest flaw is overfamiliarity. The Schulz estate would only allow this movie to be made if it fit the spirit of the existing property. Hence, it's been produced by Charles' son Craig and grandson Bryan, who also wrote the script along with Cornelius Uliano; the three have packed in so many callbacks that you very quickly come to miss the iconic jazz music Vince Guaraldi composed for 18 Peanuts TV specials, which has been mostly replaced with Christophe Beck's modern, sentimental sludge. Not to mention, there's just something off about the gang's digital hair (Linus' follicles will haunt my dreams). Your kids may love this new take, but it sure ain't Pixar. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Room ★★★★ The first voice we hear in director Lenny Abrahamson's filmed version of Emma Donoghue's novel is that of 5-year-old Jack (Jacob Tremblay), who opens with the words "Once upon a time..." But this is no fairy tale; it's a prolonged nightmare, one that began seven years earlier for Jack's "Ma" (Brie Larson). Nevertheless, she's successfully raised a wonderful child in the most horrific of situations—the two inhabit a windowless, electronically locked backyard shack, a tiny 10-by-10-foot prison. Ma is sexually abused nightly by their captor, a man known as Old Nick (Sean Bridgers), as Jack lays tucked away inside a small wardrobe. In such dire circumstances, Ma hasn't let Jack know there's life beyond the walls of "Room." But as Jack rereads Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, Ma decides to end the charade, telling her uncomprehending boy about the larger world as she formulates a plan to free them. If she's successful, Jack will enter a rabbit hole that exits into reality, like an inverse of Alice's Wonderland. Joan Allen delivers some fine work in the latter part of the picture, but it's the believable bond between the two leads and their wholly naturalistic, award-worthy performances that elevate the film into greatness. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Sicario ★★★ French-Canadian director Denis Villeneuve is making quite the career out of creating a sense of creeping dread. Prisoners, his bleak revenge drama from 2013, didn't quite work, but there was an intensity to the performances that was matched by the work of cinematographer Roger Deakins and composer Jóhann Jóhannsson. Both rejoin Villeneuve on his latest movie, a moderately more successful vigilante film that hides the dark heart of a thriller. Set at the lawless border that separates the U.S. from Mexico, this picture won't do much to sway Donald Trump's mind about the "rapists." Then again, the shadowy people working for unidentified U.S. agencies in this bleak look at the War on Drugs won't give you much faith in our own motivations or moral high ground, a lesson that's learned the hard way by idealistic federal agent Kate Macer (Emily Blunt), who's recruited by flip-flop-wearing Matt Graver (Josh Brolin), a government task force official who tells her to observe as they "shake the trees and create chaos." Watching from the shadows is Benicio Del Toro's Alejandro, a consultant with a murky past and a personal agenda. Be prepared to take a shower when it's over. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Steve Jobs ★★★1/2 Screenwriter Aaron Sorkin loosely adapts Walter Isaacson's biography Steve Jobs into what's essentially a three-act play—a very cinematic one, captured on film (16mm and 35mm) and digital by Danny Boyle, Oscar-winning director of Slumdog Millionaire. Each format records the backstage moments before a product launch—the Macintosh in 1984, the NeXT Computer in 1988 and the iMac in 1998. Sorkin being Sorkin, he takes many dramatic liberties, crafting a tale populated by the ghosts of product launches past, present and future, represented by programmers Steve "Woz" Wozniak (Seth Rogen) and Andy Hertzfeld (Michael Stuhlbarg), former Apple CEO John Sculley (Jeff Daniels, a veteran of Sorkin's Newsroom) and Jobs' oft-rejected daughter Lisa (Makenzie Moss, Ripley Sobo and Perla Haney-Jardine). Nevertheless, the movie's fanciful fiction distills a real truth about who Jobs was—warts and all. A lot of that credit also goes to Michael Fassbender; the actor may not physically resemble Jobs, but he embodies the man's vision. "I play the orchestra," Jobs says, describing what he does to Joanna Hoffman (Kate Winslet), his long-suffering "work wife." Ultimately, he's less of a husband than a father, the main role with which Sorkin defines him. (At Assembly Row, Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square, Somerville and in the suburbs.)

BRITISH INVASION They're the little band from Liverpool who made it big. No, not that band—though indie rock trio the Wombats have caught the ear of original Liverpudlian hometown hero Paul McCartney, who once said he wanted to produce an album for the group. That hasn't yet come to pass, but it hasn't stopped the band from churning out three albums of electronic-tinged Britpop, with 2015's Glitterbug marking a sparkling departure from 2011's darker This Modern Glitch, which saw frontman Matthew Murphy wrestling with depression and a troubled relationship. Come together on Nov. 23 to hear the latest from the Wombats at the House of Blues. / Hannah Landers

Edited by Sarah Hagman

TRIBE VIBES Luiseño/Shoshone-Bannock designer Jamie Okuma takes traditional motifs to new heights with these hand-stitched Christian Louboutin boots, which took hundreds of hours to cover with antique 1880s beads. Her fancy footwear is among the nearly 100 pieces featured in Native Fashion Now, a survey of 65 years of indigenous fashion stretching from pioneering Cherokee designer Lloyd "Kiva" New—whose custom clothes and accessories furnished Neiman Marcus beginning in the '50s—to contemporary Navajo designer Jared Yazzie's graphic streetwear. You can also catch designs influenced by Native American motifs from the likes of Isaac Mizrahi and Donna Karan at the exhibit, which struts its stuff at the Peabody Essex Museum from Nov. 21 through March 6. / Sarah Hagman
